

Jantharl's Surprising Journey

By Ed Greenwood

Illustration by Eva Widermann

For more than a decade now, gamers who attend GenCon have been invited to torment a long-suffering Wizards of the Coast scribe, and yours truly the bearded Father of the Realms, with story ideas: characters, beasties, names, words, items magical and otherwise, situations, plot elements, and so on. I sing, I dance, and seminar attendees try to stop me. Later—usually much later—I sit down and try to cobble together some sort of story from the assembled suggestions, and another Spin A Yarn is born. They're usually silly and somewhat humorous, but I live in hope that we'll do a serious one, some year (hint, hint, folks!).

Welcome to the latest installment in the not-so-Secret History of the Realms. As always, real-world people, places, and things, jarringly modern elements, and thoroughly inappropriate suggestions get left out. Everything else—and I mean everything, though often twisted to make it fit or even disguise it a bit—makes it in.

So, blame for some of the jests and lapses in taste can be shared. You know who you are.

As usual, everything else is my fault.

Chapter 1 The Storm before the Siege

“... and that's why the good guys always win! Ha ha ha ha ha!”

“Ho ho hee hee and various large guffaws of mirth,” Jantharl the Brightsash Bard agreed politely, managing not to yawn. Just, and only by a titanic effort that left his face momentarily a mite purple.

The fat minstrel across the table stopped laughing and looked annoyed. “Hey! That was a good one!”

“Around here, perhaps,” Jantharl said gently, signaling the tablemaid with a smile and a raised hand.

She bustled over eagerly, possibly because of the silver coin shining between his fingers. “Yes, lord?”

“I'll have the Internal Disgust and the Army of Zombies in Sauce, and then finish it off with Custard's Last Stand.”

“Very good choices, lord. This night's custard is garlic flavored.”

“Ah. Well, in that case, double the wine. Not a vampire problem, I trust?”

The maid looked horrified. “Oh, no, lord! Not around here! Never!”

“Ah, that's good to hear.” Jantharl gave her his best smile. She matched it, made his coin disappear down her bodice without appearing to use her fingers, and scurried off to the kitchens, visibly relieved. So this castle had vampires. Great.

He returned his attention to fat Melgor the Minstrel, who'd used the time Jantharl had spent conversing with the maid to vigorously stir his stew of memories. He was eager to share what had turned up.

"Heard the one about the halfling rogue who put a cursed ring on his finger, and became a she? Took away where he liked to carry—"

"As it happens," Jantharl said sourly, "I have heard that one. And the one you're going to offer me next, too. 'There once was an orc from . . .'"

The steady, expressionless look Jantharl shot across the table was a clear challenge.

Melgor met it with a scowl. "Mind reader!" he snapped. "Using magic, aren't you? That's cheating, that is." Then he brightened again. "Oh, oh, here's one! A tale that stars a hero who's afraid of wide open spaces and small, cramped rooms, too! He—"

"Hangs around in doorways a lot," Jantharl murmured. "I've heard that one, too."

Melgor looked distinctly hurt. "I'll have you know the Wondrous Strange Tales Society lauded me as the best minstrel between Tammar and Phent!"

"And I'm sure you are," Jantharl said affably, not failing to notice that the lone ring on the fat man's fingers was a plain affair that did not bear the book symbol of the Society. "I mean no disrespect, most eloquent Melgor. I just seem to be in a . . . foul mood. The armies I saw massing both east and west of this place might have something to do with it."

"Oh," Melgor replied, mollified. "That'd be a few Thayan patrols who've banded together to test how much our fair realm wants to keep Thaelfortress . . . that's Fort Thesk to you outlanders. The Thayans have taken to doing that every few months, these last two summers."

Jantharl raised an eyebrow. "And the opposing force? It looked rather larger than anything the merchants of Thesk would be apt to sponsor."

"Heavy knights from Impiltur, only too happy to slake their lances with the blood of detested Thayans and get in some battle practice. They asked permission of all the city merchant councils, and received it. After leaving two wagons brimming full of gold that are forfeit if they don't leave our soil after the fighting's done."

"Huh. So it's Impiltur against Thay. The wise versus the smart. Or perhaps the fools against the inscrutably undead. So why haven't the local merchants fled full-wheel out of here? Leaving aside the danger, a great brawling battle would seem to get in the way of trade."

Melgor chuckled. "They have, Saer Bard. Nigh everyone within the walls at this point is an outlander like you, here for adventure or to try to make coin off a siege."

"Siege?"

"Oh, aye. The Thayans never give battle in the open. They're here to practice their siegecraft. They'll beat drums and sound war horns until the knights from Impiltur come inside the castle. Then they'll surround us—and then they'll attack."

Jantharl shook his head. "I'd heard Thayans were crazed, but . . . aren't you afraid they'll win? And butcher you horribly, ere turning you into one of their undead slaves?"

"No," Melgor replied cheerfully. "I'm a minstrel. Exempt."

"Exempt? From Thayan swords? Who told you so?"

The fat minstrel beamed. "A Thayan trader. Met him in Nyth three summers back. He swore it by his father and mother."

"Whom he neglected to name, no doubt. Tell me, did anyone trust him enough to trade with him?"

Melgor frowned. "I know not. I never asked. He was dealing in . . ."

"Battle-bones for alchemists? Jars of monster blood and tentacles?"

The minstrel brightened again, nodding. "Yes! He was! B'Tymora, you're good!"

"Not good enough," Jantharl said grimly, getting up. "But if I can move as fast as a hrasted lightning bolt, I just might get clear of this castle before—"

Whatever else he'd been saying was lost in a sudden roll of thunder that swallowed all other sounds and set the very roof of the inn above them to rattling. Doors and windows banged open, and the gathering dusk outside burst into blinding white brightness.

Then it went dark—just before flashing again, to the accompaniment of a scream and the reek of cooked horseflesh.

Thunder clapped again, this time sounding like someone had dropped several wagonloads of armor on the roof.

Melgor looked mournful. "Someone forgot to get their horse inside in time." Then he brightened. "All the more for the kitchens, though." He rubbed his hands. "I love a good horse pie, don't you? Big as a shield, all golden brown crust and steaming, diced—"

"Unmentionables inside," Jantharl finished for him. "In gravy." He swung his cloak around his shoulders. "The moment that lightning's farther off, I'll retrieve my mount from the stables and—"

"Oh, but it won't," the minstrel warned. "Get farther off, that is. This isn't any gods-sent storm, it's the Thayans. They do this before every battle. The streets won't be safe until they've surrounded us. They send bolts of lightning snarling all over, once every few breaths or so. I imagine those knights are going to shed their armor right speedily, and their horses' barding, too, and come in here in their under-leathers."

As if in confirmation, lightning spat through one of the storm-opened windows and crackled along one side of the inn's common room. Sparks showered from ancient shields hanging on the wall.

Jantharl sat down again, offering all the curses he could remember to the ceiling. It seemed not to hear, perhaps because it was busy shaking from a fresh roll of thunder.

Melgor listened with interest, looking increasingly impressed.

Chapter 2

The Statue in the Courtyard

The sky overhead split in an even more spectacular explosion of lightning. Bright bolts arced in all directions, lancing from the mountains to the roiling clouds and back again in blinding volleys.

Jantharl winced, grabbing at his eyes. "Are the Red Wizards trying to outdo Lantanna fireworks, or something?"

"That'll be the last one," Melgor offered. "They always end with that. Very soon now it'll be safe to set foot outside."

Jantharl turned in the slackening downpour to give him a level, sour look. "Thank you for that timely advice, friend minstrel."

"You're welcome," the fat man chirped cheerfully, either missing the sarcasm or ignoring it. Rainwater streamed from his beard as if his chin were a tap.

The hammering rain had eased enough that Jantharl could see his surroundings. The "castle" that was Thaelfortress was a great irregular ring of curtain walls backed up against soaring mountainside cliffs. Within those walls was a small stone city or a large stone town, all cobbles and very solid, thick-walled stone buildings with slate or tile roofs, and not a tree or a patch of greenery to be seen.

Its inns flew banners so visiting outlanders could find them, and contrary to what the knight had said, Jantharl had counted five thus far. All such flags were attached to large, ugly, rambling buildings he knew to be bulging with large, hairy, bad-tempered knights from Impiltur. Hungry, wet, missing their armor and swords—and not happy about it. The brawls would be raging in earnest, about now. Just as the siege of undead armies in their uncounted lurching, staggering thousands began.

Bah. He'd not picked a good time to take shelter in this particular unfriendly and primitive backland settlement.

The next strike was accompanied by a thunderous hammering on the inn's front door.

Since he was on his feet already, Jantharl got to the door first.

He was less than surprised to find a crowd of surly, drenched warriors in scorched leather outside, all heavy stubble and angry glares. They pushed past him without greeting.

"Tluning Thayans and their storms! If skeletons and zombies felt the wet, they'd change horses in a hurry!"

"Say, now—that's a banner-bright thought, right there! Get an archmage to craft a spell to make skeletons and zombies dissolve in rain! That'd put some cold fingers of fear up Red Wizard backsides, that would!"

"Huh! The only cold fingers Red Wizards feel belong to Szass Tam!"

"Ale! Ale!"

"Any roasts hot and ready?"

"Ho, the kitchens!"

"Can we get a catoblepas? Properly marinated?"

Jantharl got back to his table in time to accept his bowl of Internal Disgust before it could vanish down an Impilturan gullet. It was hot and drenched in a sickly-looking greenish-brown gravy . . . and it proved to be well named. His stomach heaved.

"The trick," Melgor observed smugly, watching him with amusement, "is to drink heavily. Wine, for preference. It sluices all the grease and gristle down, so to speak."

"Marvelous," Jantharl growled, his innards rising again.

"Well, if you're going to spew in it, I'll eat it," one of the knights from Impiltur snarled, snatching the bowl out of Jantharl's hands.

Jantharl let it go without battle. But when his wine arrived and many hairy Impilturan hands reached for the decanter, he let fly with his steel-toed boots, displaying both savage eagerness and deft expertise.

He managed to win time and space enough to down most of it in one long, fiery pull.

"Buy your own!" he snapped, in tones of ringing command that he hoped these burly hulks around him were accustomed to obeying. Then he drained the jack, belched heartily in a few Impilturan faces, and found his feet again.

"Ho, bard, where're you off to, hey?" the innkeeper barked from the kitchen door. "You owe three silver so far, an' then there's the stabling!"

"Checking on my horse!" Jantharl barked right back. "The lightning and all!"

"No fear, my stable's're set proper to snare lightning! Your beast'll be right as rain, I'll swear!"

As if on cue, rain—or perhaps hail—fell upon the inn roof like several hundred hard-armored fists. The din was augmented by a deluge that erupted from one corner of the common room ceiling, causing several knights to hastily abandon their table.

"Farruking Thayans," an Impilturan growled feelingly. "Ho, housemaster! You do have a roast spitted and nigh done, aye? A large wild boar, or something bigger?"

"Of course!" the innkeeper replied. "This is the finest inn in Thaelfortress!"

"It's the only inn in Thaelfortress," the knight growled back.

The common room ceiling promptly sprang another leak—right over his head.

The Impilturan's curses, offered from the midst of the torrent, were far more graphic and crude than Jantharl's.

Melgor the Minstrel, listening hard as he took firm possession of Jantharl's Army of Zombies in Sauce, looked suitably impressed.

A chill wet mist blanketed the ground, which according to a cheerful Melgor, was normal most of the year. The cold, drenching rain pelted down without dissipating the swirling fog in the slightest. The streets were ankle-deep in water, despite the loud gurgles of drains coming from seemingly everywhere.

Not surprisingly, the minstrel and the bard were alone in the streets. They'd come two or three blocks from the inn, and stood in the widest street Jantharl had yet found in the city. Ahead, it widened into a large, open, rain-swept space that had some sort of statue on a plinth in the center.

"The Great Mustering Yard of Thesk," Melgor announced grandly, indicating the open space with a flourish.

Thunder rolled again, like divine indigestion, and a spark snapped into being at the end of his pointing finger. He winced and jerked that injured digit back, dancing in pain among the deep puddles.

"Of course it is," Jantharl agreed, looking at the growing lake that covered most of the courtyard. He noticed the litter of poles and rotting awnings that leaned against distant walls. Mustering yard? he thought. Street market, more like it. "Who's yon statue immortalize?"

"No one knows, anymore—or rather, no one agrees about who it is," the minstrel replied, wringing his scorched hand. "The inscription's gone."

"Just the inscription?" the bard asked, sloshing on through the deepening water. He was close enough to the statue now to see its spectacular curves. Female, decidedly buxom, and . . . dragon-headed?

She was sculpted in exquisite detail, in a dramatic, even heroic pose. Her front foot was slightly raised as if to stride forward, with one hand on the opposite shapely hip and her other outthrust like a lance, pointing on across the great open courtyard in the direction they'd been headed. Various rotting loops of cord hung from her limbs, no doubt where enterprising merchants had slung lines of merchandise or banners crying the names and wares of their businesses to the passing Realms. There'd once been a legend engraved on a large name block under the statue, but someone had attacked it with enthusiasm and a good set of mason's tools. Years back, judging by the hue and the condition of the ravaged stone.

"Just the inscription. As you can see, someone chiseled it away, but they like to say around the castle that it just wore away under centuries of scrawled profanity," Melgor admitted, joining Jantharl. "She's a dragonborn, as you can see. Nothing broken or missing except the name."

"Dressed as a monk."

The minstrel nodded. "Said to be of Deneir, and from Candlekeep. Her lips move from time to time, though no sound comes out. They say she remembers the future, because she's living backward. Soon she'll reach the moment she became a statue."

"And then what?"

"No one knows—or rather, no one can agree. Some say she was alive, and got petrified."

"Of course. What's she pointing at?"

"Violatarr's Magnificent Mansion of Taste Violations. Our local festhall."

Jantharl chuckled. "Well, this is the first statue I've seen that's useful to someone other than a pigeon, then. Lusty visiting outlanders, hie thyselves this way." He squinted through the rain, which seemed to be letting up a little, in the direction the anonymous dragonborn monk was pointing. "So what's yon statue over the festhall door, then?"

"A giant dire siege rat, wearing a monocle. No, don't ask, because no one knows. It just appeared one morning. The work of a wizard who shapechanged and then petrified an enemy, perhaps—but that's just my guess."

"And the festhall . . . how is it?"

"Well . . ." Melgor coughed. "A better shelter against the Thayan bombardments than the open courtyard, to be sure!"

"Thayan—?"

Just then, something hurtled out of the drizzle. Something large and dark and—abruptly splattered all over the courtyard beyond in a great sappy splurpf that covered a wide fan of cobbles with disgusting wetness.

"These Thayan bombardments," the minstrel said helpfully, dodging behind the statue. Jantharl joined him hastily, peering at the dead whatever-it-was adorning the cobbles. It seemed to have a fin, a sinuous line that thrust up grotesquely from the largest lump of spreading, sticky chaos.

"Land shark," Melgor supplied. "Bulette. Transported here by siege engine."

Jantharl raised an eyebrow. "Traditionally begins the barrage?"

The minstrel smiled and nodded. "Indeed. Cooked land shark, mind. So the populace of the besieged fortress won't go hungry."

"Indeed," Jantharl agreed darkly, surveying the ichorous mass again. "Yet I find myself less than ravenous, somehow."

"Wait until they start using the cattlepult," Melgor said brightly, "and the slings-hits."

"Slings-hits? They, ah, fling chamber pot leavings, beast dung, that sort of thing?"

"You're quick!"

"Well, I am a bard," Jantharl pointed out. "An anointed, official liar and tall-tale teller. Conclusions are things bards leap at, wildly and all the time."

The fat minstrel chuckled. "I knew it would be entertaining, tagging along with you! Now we'd better make a run for it, before the real bombardment starts. So . . . to the festhall, or Fzoul's Tongue, beyond, or back to the inn?"

"What," Jantharl asked, suppressing a sigh, "is Fzoul's Tongue?"

"Yon street, over there, on around yon bend. Named for the risen exarch Fzoul Chembryl, he who—"

Chapter 3 The Cowardly Minotaur

"Yes, yes, I know who Fzoul is, but why is it named for him? He didn't lick its cobbles with his tongue, or some such, did he?"

"Well, ah, yes he did, in, uh, a manner of speaking. He appeared here in the castle—at the far end of the Tongue, where it meets four other streets, and there's a tavern of sorts, that I'll take you to if you'd like. He was surrounded by the dark power of Bane, a huge high towering shroud of very impressive glowing blackness, with little blood-stars dancing all over it. Anyhail, he appeared, all suddenlike, to denounce a few betrayers of Bane who'd come here to dwell in hiding. They took one look at him and fled like blazes down yon street. So Fzoul spat out a spell that made his tongue into a long, racing carpet that ran along the walls of the buildings to outpace them before swerving down to the cobbles in front of them. Then it snapped back to him, rolling them all up as prisoners in front of Fzoul."

"And then he swallowed them like a froghemoth," Jantharl said sarcastically.

Meglor stared at him, crestfallen. "Oh. You've already heard all about it."

Jantharl hadn't known anything about Fzoul's acrobatic tongue ere now, but he smiled pleasantly and spread his hands in an oh-so-worldly, expressive shrug. "I am a bard." He lifted his voice in the lazy refrain, "Time's fun when you're having flies," then paused expectantly.

The fat minstrel clapped his hands with glee and happily supplied the next line: "It's not easy, being green and terrifying, when those humans, all the monsters they're frying, but I've got my eyes, and—"

Thankfully this off-key masterpiece was interrupted with a sudden rain of wet, spattering brown missiles that splashed all over the mustering yard, endowing it with the unmistakable smell known across the Realms as "the stench of the jakes."

The real bombardment had begun.

"If I wanted to be drenched in dung, I could have just stayed home on the farm, all those years ago," Jantharl said bitterly, crouching in the lee of the rapidly browning statue with Melgor. "We had heaps of the stuff. Not to mention pits full of it. It was my job to move the heaps into the pits, and then empty the pits onto the fields, shovel-full after shovel-full."

"Well, if you'd had a Thayan cattlepult . . ." Melgor offered brightly.

"My spreading would have been this accurate. Uh-huh." The Brightsash Bard surveyed the Great Mustering Yard of Thesk sourly. It already looked more like a freshly turned field than a cobbled courtyard, and it was getting browner—and more pungent—with each passing breath. The splattering of dung was louder than the rain, now.

Amid all the heavily splashing wetness came a heavier, splintering crash. Jantharl and Melgor peered around.

"Ah," the minstrel explained. "Broadsheet scribe." He took one look at the lolling neck of the limp figure and winced. The dead man was strapped to a shattered, improvised cage of timbers to which had been lashed an untidy array of bulging—and now mostly ruptured—cotton sacks. The cage had landed, all too hard, atop the land shark ere skidding across much of the courtyard. "Too little padding, or too strong a catapult. Pity."

"Broadsheet scribe?" Jantharl peered incredulously through the rain at the freshly dead man. "A Thayan prisoner, you mean, sent as a threat? To warn folk they'd best not spread word of the siege? Have the Thayans never heard of rumors? Caravans carrying news far and fast and increasingly lurid? Or is that aimed at us?"

"Oh, no, yon poor fool's no prisoner. He's a customer."

"Hey?"

"He paid them to get, ah, delivered here. There'll be more landing over the next few days . . . among less pleasant things."

As if the unseen Thayans had been awaiting that cue, the slings-hits resumed, adorning the unfortunate scribe and his padded cage with wet, brown splodges. Lots of wet splodges.

"Thesk, land of merchants," Melgor explained, "has been persuaded by Sembia—land of richer merchants—to forbid broadsheet scribes from observing the fray. Most folk across the Realms would think this whole annual siege crazed-wits foolery. Our merchant councils know that, and quite rightly think it would make Thesk look bad. So . . ."

"So they're trying to hush it up, because that will make them look so much less foolish," Jantharl said sarcastically. "Aye, that'll work."

"Well, they think it does," rasped a new voice. "Not surprising, really. Rulers everywhere believe what they want to believe. After all, their lackeys spend a lot of time telling them what they want to hear."

The speaker was very near, and somehow below Jantharl, even though he crouched low on the wet cobbles, in the protective lee of the statue. He blinked down, seeking the source. Then stared hard, and blinked again.

Only to find himself still looking at the same thing he'd beheld before. A small, upright purple and blue creature with huge, sad, imploring eyes. It looked like a lizard in some places and like a plump bird in others.

"Aye, I'm beautiful. And aye, I'm more than used to folk staring. Tired of it, even," the bird-thing told Jantharl sourly. "I'm a wizard's familiar, so offer me no violence. His spells are . . . rather nasty, if you're facing him in battle."

Jantharl looked around. It was raining dung all over the courtyard again. "Where . . . where did you come from?"

"I appeared. By magic. Wizard, remember?"

"This is Floonq," Melgor said helpfully, waving at the bird-thing. "He came out of the back of the statue right beside you. There's a concealed hatch about a hand's length square where one of the stones turns on hinges, like a door. Right by your left elbow."

Jantharl sighed. "Any other interesting local features close to me you've, ah, forgotten to tell me about?"

"No."

Jantharl gave him a long, steady look. Then he dropped his gaze to the familiar again. "Well met, Floonq. Might I know the name of your wizard?"

"Tamaszar of the Ten Invoked Tempests. He's a minotaur, and a mite shy. I talk for the both of us."

"You think for the both of you," Melgor commented dryly—which earned him a long, steady look from Floonq. "And your magic outstrips his."

"Spill not all my secrets right off to a new acquaintance, thank you very much, friend minstrel," the familiar snapped.

"If it isn't impertinent to ask, what manner of creature are you?" Jantharl asked Floonq.

"I'm an urhult. Now you know quite enough about me; have you any lore of comparable value to yield in return?"

Jantharl spread his hands. "I know not, being unaware of your interests. However, I've traveled the Realms extensively, and kept my eyes open on my journeys. Ask."

"Why are you here?"

"I had to stop somewhere on this particular journey. And behold, when I saw a need, there Fort Thesk was, on the map and indeed rising up, tall and real and rather unprepossessing, ahead of my tired mount. So here I am. I know nothing about this castle other than what Melgor has told me."

The urhult sniffed. "Then you know nothing at all accurate about it." It cocked its head to give Jantharl a rather beady glare. "Can you keep a secret?"

Jantharl grinned. "I'm a bard. Which means not at all. Not for longer than a breath or two, if I can put said secret into a song. Why? Have you a secret that's halfway interesting?"

Floonq's eyes twinkled. "Let the judgment be yours, Saer Bard. My secret is this: The contents of every last granary inside the walls of Thaelfortress have been poisoned, so only preserves and the cattle penned nigh the mountainside are safe to butcher and eat. The deaths started this morning."

"Poisoned?" Jantharl tried vainly to remember if he'd eaten anything baked since his arrival. "Who, and why?"

"The Thayans. They decided to make things more thorough this year, I guess."

Jantharl found himself sighing again. A bard's luck seemed to be one thing in song and legend and quite another in real life.

Another splintering crash heralded the arrival of a second caged broadsheet scribe. This one landed upside down against the wall of a building, spattering it with red. Seeing that, the urhult and the two men behind the statue didn't bother to look for a living passenger to help.

"Come," Floonq commanded. "They'll stop the dung barrage long enough for him to run for shelter—if he could still run anywhere. We'll run for him."

He set off across the sticky, reeking courtyard in the direction of Fzoul's Tongue. Jantharl and Melgor hastened after him.

"Where are we headed?" Jantharl asked.

"The Cursing Priestess. A tavern."

"Of sorts," Melgor commented.

Jantharl was treated to the interesting spectacle of an urhult shrugging.

They slipped and skidded into the Tongue. There the ground was sheltered by overhanging balconies and even a few buildings that joined together over the street. Once inside, he dared to ask, "So if you dwell here and know all about these sieges, why'd you venture out into the heart of a dung bombardment? Are we that interesting?"

"Not 'we,' outlander. You."

"Me? Why? You couldn't have known I was a bard until we talked."

"Oh? You think yourself a man of mystery, striding Thesk unnoticed and unremarked? Think again, Jantharl Harlenduth."

Jantharl blinked. "You know my . . ."

"Evidently." The urhult waddled along the Tongue at a brisk pace.

"So why am I so interesting?"

"Not particularly. Interesting, that is. You are, however, potentially very useful. If we can keep you alive, that is."

"Well, that's good to know. I have some interest in staying alive, myself." Jantharl waited, but the urhult just kept lurching down the street. He swallowed a sigh and asked instead, "Useful how?"

"You can take something out of Thaelfortress for us. Before Tathtauraunt finds it."

Jantharl didn't bother quelling his sigh this time. "What's the something, and who is Tathtauraunt?"

"I'm not discussing the something out here in the open street. Or Tathtauraunt, for that matter."

Jantharl looked up and down the empty street. Ahead, it curved and rose into unseen distances amid the drizzle and eddying fog. Behind them there was the faint roar of the resumed bombardment.

"Very well," he told the urhult. "Properly placed prudence is always a good thing. So I'll learn about these things when and where?"

"Tavern. If Tamaszar is willing."

"Very well—" Jantharl broke off abruptly as the urhult erupted off the cobbles in a loud, wet flurry of untidy flapping. It rose in a spiral that brought it under Jantharl's nose just long enough to favor him with a glare and a warning hiss.

Then the urhult flew in an ungainly arc over a hanging shop sign, only to plummet like a stone—talons out—and land hard on the head of a masked man who'd just peered out from behind the shutters of a window. The urhult kept flapping as it clawed, dragging the mask askew and then down over the face of the suddenly struggling man. Floonq threw back its ugly head and let out a high, shrill, ululating cry, then sprang aloft again, flapping in real haste.

The ball of purple flames that burst into being right in front of the masked man enveloped his head, scorched the shutters, and almost singed the hastening urhult's tail.

Then it was gone, as quickly as it had come, leaving behind a slumping corpse with a blackened skull for a head.

The urhult fluttered back down to the cobbles and resumed leading Jantharl and Meglor. The look it cast back up at them was smug.

"Will I learn about that, too?" Jantharl asked, managing to sound a trifle calmer than he felt.

The urhult nodded just as they reached a five-way street moot. The urhult marched right up to the door of a wedge-shaped building that filled one angle of the intersection. The door had an angry, open-mouthed woman's face carved in wood over it and a collar proclaiming it "The Cursing Priestess: A Superior Quaffing Establishment."

Jantharl let that claim pass without comment and allowed himself to follow the urhult into a dark, shabby alehouse. The Cursing Priestess was a maze of worn flagstones, dark booths, pillars, and low-voiced murmurings, every plank and cranny of which reeked of stale, long-ago-spilled beer.

The alehouse's half-orc peacekeeper, sporting a breastplate that bristled with the projecting handles of a dozen or so cudgels, loomed up out of the gloom. He took one look at the urhult and beckoned Jantharl and Meglor down a dimly lit passage. Halfway down it, he flung wide a narrow door for them that led off to one side. Then he strode off along the rest of the main passage without stopping, to disappear behind a distant curtain.

Beyond the door was a dimly lit room in which sat a minotaur, dressed in a rich red robe. The minotaur regarded them cautiously from behind a glowing crystal ball set in a frame atop a polished table.

Floonq bounded up onto the table and glared into the minotaur's deep brown eyes.

"Stop cowering," Floonq hissed at him. Then it turned and snapped at Melgor, "Close the door and swing the bolt down."

When that had been done, the urhult drew itself up and announced proudly, "Gentlesaers, I present to you: Tammaszar of the Ten Invoked Tempests."

The crystal ball flashed blinding bright.

Chapter 4 The Book Many Seek

Jantharl had been expecting that particular mage's trick, and had squeezed his eyes almost shut just before the crystal sphere flared. His hand darted to the dagger at his belt in case the flash was buying time for an attack.

Yet through his lashes, he could see the minotaur wasn't working magic. Rather, he was blushing and cowering in his chair.

"Those were your purple flames out there, aye?" Melgor asked quietly. When the great horned head nodded, the minstrel added, "So who was he?"

"A Warlock Knight of Vaasa," Floonq replied crisply. "They're after the something."

Jantharl opened his eyes. "Well met, Saer Tammaszar," he greeted the minotaur pleasantly. "So are you going to tell us just what this 'something' is? Now, perhaps?"

"I hadn't heard," the urhult snapped, "that bards were so impatient."

"We leave out such little human touches," Jantharl snapped back. "So as to make our tales and ballads so much less believable."

He and Floonq glared at each other for the space of a long, silent breath ere the urhult looked away and said sourly, "The 'something' is a book." It turned to the minotaur mage, who swiftly waved at it to continue.

The urhult turned back to the bard and the minstrel and sighed.

In unison with Jantharl, as it turned out. Floonq's eyes flashed with fresh irritation.

"I am beginning to reconsider the wisdom . . ." it began, making those words a weapon.

"And so you begin to grow wiser," Jantharl interrupted smoothly. He smiled. "Consider me a fool—and you a larger one for contacting me—and speak plainly. Unless you think the Thayans will delay their siege indefinitely for us to discuss matters at leisure."

It seemed the Thayans were either eavesdropping—even though the faint singing sound of a warding spell emanated from the crystal—or were very good at anticipating cues and meeting them.

Before the urhult could frame the sharp reply its angry face heralded, there was a loud, splintering crash from nearby. That crash was followed by the slow, rumbling groan of something heavy and wooden tearing apart and slowly toppling . . . resulting in a deeper, greater crash that shook the tavern.

"They've run out of dung?" Jantharl asked mildly, raising his eyebrows.

Melgor coughed. "For now. And so, the hail of stone begins. Having used up most of the easily harvested boulders hereabouts, the Thayans have taken to bringing wagonloads of broken rock with them. We had a local sage who once explained to me why they do what they do, but two sieges ago he got fatally . . . boulder."

There came a fainter, more distant crash, then one still farther off.

"Very well," Floonq said crisply. "Plain, swift speech. My master—Tammaszar, here—possesses a book we need removed from Thesk. As a widely traveled wayfarer, you, Saer Harlenduth, are an ideal conveyor of the book out of the castle. Unless you display it openly or otherwise attract attention to it by your behavior, you won't soon be suspected of carrying it. Hopefully you will be able to, ah, dispose of it before being chased, and so pretend innocence of it."

"Dispose of it? Why not just burn it in the nearest grate?"

"Ah, not that sort of disposal. I should have said take it to one of several suitable individuals—that we'll name if you accept the task—and give it into their keeping."

"So what is this book? And who's Tathtauraunt, and why mustn't he or she—or it, I suppose—find it?"

Floonq looked meaningfully at its master, who nodded and hastily cast another warding spell. This one made the crystal's radiance turn a delicate mauve and darkened the room around them, making it suddenly seem more a cavern or a cellar than a tavern's back room.

"The book is, as you may have guessed, magical. It's called Lanthroanra's Unfolding Lament, after she who created it. That's her statue you hid behind, out in the mustering yard. Or rather, that was her. Turned to stone. Whenever her book is read, her lips—stone or not—move soundlessly to shape the words being read. Then they move again, when the foretold events actually occur. It's said her mind empowers the book, causing the prophecies to appear within it."

"So it doesn't always have the same words in it?"

"Oh, no. It tells whoever reads it what's going to befall the next day—cryptically and partially, of course—"

"Of course," Jantharl and Melgor agreed in perfect cynical unison.

Floonq looked hurt, but resumed speaking. "And when words in it are read, they disappear. Oh, and it must be read from back to front."

The bard and the minstrel didn't bother to repeat their chorus. They merely looked at the urhult meaningfully.

"I didn't make the book," the familiar snapped. "I'm just trying to get it out of Thaelfortress before it dooms us all."

"Of course you are," Jantharl agreed. "And how exactly is this book going to doom us all?"

"Well, if it fell into the wrong hands, it—"

"And which hands would those be?" Melgor fired his question with a grin and a wink to Jantharl.

Floonq snarled, "Anyone unscrupulous enough to make use of the book's foretelling to work great evil in the world. Like the besieging Thayans, for example. Or Tathtauraunt."

Jantharl seldom rolled his eyes, but he felt the need to do so now, and he succumbed to it. "The Thayans besiege this castle annually to get a book? Forgive me, but why don't they just send some Red Wizards in, suitably disguised, and take it? Or get to Candlekeep or some other place that has a decent library? Surely some sage has seen this book and written exhaustively about it?"

The familiar let out a gusty sigh. "I told you this wouldn't be easy," it said to the minotaur.

"Nothing worthwhile in life is," Jantharl commented tartly. "Would this book be why broadsheet scribes are getting themselves killed being catapulted into the castle?"

"Of course," Floonq replied. "Its foretelling abilities make it a treasure beyond price for them. And before you ask me why they don't just walk into Thaelfortress some other time to try to track down the book, be aware that their masters are just as skeptical as the Thayans about the Lament. The broadsheet scribes' masters only send them to cover the siege, hoping for bloodthirsty accounts of evil undead Thayans ravaging innocent Theskians."

"So if the Thayans are skeptical . . ." Melgor began, but the familiar interrupted him.

"The Red Wizards don't believe the book is useful for foretelling. However, if it exists and is magical, they want it so as to keep anyone else from having it. Most of them think it's a mere fanciful fireside tale, but standing in the Thayan army outside our walls right now are a few descendants of Lanthroanra. Those descendants keep talking and talking about the book in hopes that the Red Wizards will seize it and be impressed enough to want to harness Lanthroanra's magical skills, and so unpetrify her."

"Have they thought about how much of a Thayan slave an unpetrified Lanthroanra would be?" Jantharl asked.

The urhult shrugged. "If they have, they've not spoken of it. Perhaps they have plans, or know something about Lanthroanra's magical might that we don't."

Jantharl rolled his eyes again. "Very well. Is the book dangerous to hold?"

The minotaur shook his head, but at the bard's searching look merely added, "No."

Jantharl nodded. "So tell me about this Tathtauraunt."

Floonq strode across the table until its face was close to the bard's and said, "I speak seriously, Saer Brightsash Bard, so mock me not. Your life could depend on it. 'Of course.'"

Jantharl smiled thinly and nodded.

Satisfied, the familiar added, "Behold in your mind's eye a gigantic beholder that has only four eyestalks—but each one ends in a beholder the size of most eye tyrants. And each of these beholders is in possession of all the usual eyes. That is Tathtauraunt."

Jantharl nodded. "Well enough, I'm impressed, all ri—"

"There's more. For decades now, some illithids have been imprisoned in the dungeons beneath us. They are chained half-submerged in the castle drains so their efforts must be spent on not drowning. They can never sleep, lest they slip beneath the sewer water, and they can never stand idle, lest the cold sap the life from them. As our local jest puts it: We have our mind flayers in the gutter.”

Chapter 5 First Blood

“Ha ha,” Jantharl said politely. “And?”

“And Tathtauraunt seeks to work its way ever closer to these mind flayers, to free them. If it succeeds, it may well gain a small but formidable army to do its bidding.”

“And how is a gigantic beholder—or a gigantic anything—going to work its way close to these mind flayers?” Jantharl asked. “If it tries to blast its way in, won’t it be noticed? Causing, if Thaelfortress lacks good means of fighting it, a general stampede to flee fast and far across the Realms?”

“You think keenly, Saer Bard.”

“I state the blood-drenched obvious, Saer Urhult, but let that pass. I’m waiting for you to tell me there’s yet more.”

“There is. The Impilturans have heard of the book. It’s why they’re here as well. The knights, that is, that have come these last two sieges in place of the usual soldiers in need of training. They’re looking for it.”

“So if they see me sauntering along the Tongue with the book under my arm . . .”

“It will be . . . unfortunate.”

“I begin to grasp why you went out in a rain of dung to fetch the only men foolish enough to be out in it.”

“You do indeed,” the urhult said in a dry voice as it strode back and forth across the table. “So . . . are you with us?”

Jantharl sighed heavily, rolled his eyes—and then grinned and shrugged. “Sure. Why not? I’ve always wanted to do something as crazed as the things I sing about.”

Melgor applauded briefly—and when the familiar glared at him, fired right back, “I do hope recruiting a passing bard wasn’t your first and only plan, Floonq.”

“It wasn’t,” the urhult snapped. “I also tried to create false books that display random writings borrowed from existing texts to use as distractions for the foes of Thesk. And I failed. I considered myself a minor master of magic . . . but crafting lasting items that do more than blast things is, it seems, beyond me.” Floonq strode forward and looked at the minstrel and then at the bard. “Neither of you saers would happen to be an arch-crafter of magic items, would you?”

Two heads were shaken.

“If I was,” Melgor added, “do you think I’d be a minstrel in this windswept castle, scratching out a living making and singing courting songs for tongue-tied suitors? Or writing and performing trumped-up ballads of the exploits of dearly departed family matriarchs and patriarchs? Or trying to amuse drunken Impilturans for a few coppers and whatever ale the tankards they hurl at me still hold?”

The urhult shrugged. “Ask me no questions of that sort. Most of the careers and pastimes of humans seem crazed to me.”

“First blood!” Jantharl said approvingly. “Ouch, and so forth.” He looked at the minotaur. “So if I’m going to get myself killed taking your book elsewhere, I’d like to know more about you. So I can work on a new ballad as I’m running, fighting, and dying, you understand. So, Tammaszar, ye of the Ten Invoked Tempests . . . what were those tempests, and why did you invoke them? Or did someone else do the invoking, and you just did the surviving, like a warrior who lists the battles he endured?”

The minotaur blushed, looked away, and said softly, “Beware, Saer Harlenduth. I’m known to be an outrageous liar who spins tales about spectacular adventures I really haven’t had.”

Jantharl chuckled. “Ho, Tammaszar! Bard, here.” He tapped his own chest. Then he hooked his thumb in the direction of Melgor. “Minstrel. Lie away.”

“No,” Melgor said suddenly, as there were more distant crashes outside. “Truth. We’ve time only for truth, now. Jantharl, you should know that the ten tempests were Tammaszar’s mother’s temper tantrums, brought on down the years by the things he said. Or rather, the things he admitted. Tamm is an utter, flat-out coward who’s rather proud of being so because he’s survived when most of the mages he trained with—or under—have died because they tended toward pride, not fear. Being a minotaur, he actually likes to call himself a ‘cow-ard.’”

Jantharl winced. “Sure he doesn’t secretly want to be a minstrel?”

The fat minstrel’s reply was a withering look, and Jantharl hastily added, “Sorry, I meant to say ‘bard-in-training.’”

Melgor grinned. “Got you. Now, Tamm here really isn’t still alive because he’s been so effectively cowardly. He’s still alive because Floonq sees so keenly and is so good at hauling him out of trouble. Getting rid of the book is his latest, ah, lessening of local minotaur endangerment scheme.”

“Well put,” the urhult agreed. “Keep going; we’re covering a lot here, swiftly, as the bard in the room seems slower to make smart comments when you’re talking.”

Jantharl dusted off his best withering look and presented it to the familiar. Who managed a rude gesture that its physique had implied it couldn’t produce.

“Tamm here has the book. But he’s afraid to read it. Thaelfortress is too small a place to keep the book’s owner a secret for long. So, Floonq made it known that Tamm has it—and that he will use its awesome powers, which he, ahem, rather embroidered—against anyone who attacks him. Leave him and the book alone, and you will be safe from both him and it. Menace him . . . and Thaelfortress will become your death trap."

Jantharl gave the familiar a hard look. "So it is all your fault. How do we know you aren't a Thayan agent? Or just trying to get as many humans killed as you can, so the urhults can found a realm of their own here?"

Floonq looked more incredulous than outraged. "Here? Bard, who in their right mind would want to found a realm here? Right on the doorstep of a relentlessly rapacious realm of crazed wizards and their endless marauding undead armies? I know you're a bard, but use your head!"

Jantharl raised a hand. "Fair enough. I withdraw my query. Forgive me, but I'm suspicious by nature, and"—he swung his gaze back to the minotaur—"I know I've seen you before. Where, and doing what?"

"Just about anywhere in the Realms, perhaps," the mage behind the table replied. "I make maps for Realms Revealed Trading."

"The first place to go when you want to know where to go," Jantharl murmured the trading company's motto aloud. "That's it. Somewhere along the Shining Sea coast, it was . . ."

"I was born here. Really. Horns and all. The members of my family have been launderers in the castle for three generations. All save for my brother Helglan, who is a bit of a battle hero; the Wondrous Strange Tales Society's thinking of expelling him. All my kin left to buy new wash vats in Telflamm a tenday back. They couldn't get back in now if they wanted to." The minotaur's stomach rumbled loudly. "And as I don't fancy eating beef, I'm starving."

Jantharl fumbled in his belt pouch, found the end of a trail sausage he kept there, and tossed it across the table. "Here. Hog meat. Rather peppery, and dry as a ruler's wit, but good."

Tammaszar reached for it gratefully. "Thanks!"

"Ware!" his familiar snapped. "It could be poisoned!"

The minotaur sighed. "I appreciate your concern, Floonq, but in life, you have to trust someone."

"Why?"

Whatever reply Tammaszar might have made to the urhult's snapped question was lost and forgotten in the sudden crash, roar, and rumble of something very hard and heavy smashing into—and then through—the tavern roof. The room shook, dust rained down from the ceiling, and the door rattled against its bolt.

Then the building stopped quivering—which seemed to be the cue for an eruption of shrieks and shouted prayers.

"Open the door," Floonq ordered. "Cautiously, mind. Part of the ceiling could be leaning against it."

Melgor and Jantharl worked the bolt and the door together and peered out in cautious unison. Nothing leaned against the door, but part of the passage's ceiling had fallen, some distant lanterns had gone out, and the darkened tavern was in an uproar.

"Only the Beagle of Competence can save us now!" a man a few rooms away was bawling. "He must bark up the wrong tree!"

Jantharl looked at Melgor, and Melgor looked at Jantharl.

Then, with one accord, they closed and re-bolted the door.

"One can't invent such madness for ballads," the bard said woefully.

"And use it without being laughed at," the minstrel agreed.

They turned back to the room in time to hear the ceiling above groan horribly—and to see the cause.

The tavern had been struck by a coach-sized boulder, doubtless hurled by a siege engine. It had plunged through the roof and the attic beneath—and then through the room below that—to protrude between straining ceiling beams into their chamber.

Tammaszar and Floonq hastily relocated in the direction of the door as the jagged surface of the stone settled closer and closer to the tabletop.

Jantharl peered at it. "Is that . . . writing?"

"It is," the urhult confirmed, pushing past him. "It says: 'If you can read this, you're too close.'" It glared up at Melgor. "So open the door."

The minstrel obliged.

As they all hastened out, Jantharl commented, "Nice to know one of the Thayans has a sense of humor."

"Oh, I've met that particular Thayan," the urhult snapped. "He doesn't just scratch those words on boulders."

"Pray pardon, gentlesaers! Pray pardon!"

The voice hailing them from the passage, and approaching rapidly, was young, male, and excited. Jantharl raised his eyebrows—and drew his dagger.

So did Melgor. The minstrel proved to have two daggers easily to hand.

"We're ready now," the urhult announced grimly into the darkness. "You can attack."

"Uh, sorry?"

A lantern was hastily unshuttered and raised to shine on its holder's empty free hand and eager young face.

"I come in peace!" he said hastily. "And unarmed! See?"

"That's nice," the urhult replied, "but we're rather busy right now, and—"

The young man with the lantern looked down and saw who—or what—was answering him. His mouth fell open, and his eyes bulged with astonishment and delight. "Ooooh! Who are you?"

"Floonq," the urhult replied sourly. "And who are you?"

"Aerad Chuhyuk, of Manycastle News! Here to get stories of the siege!"

"Well, uh, we're rather busy right now," Melgor told the young man, "and—"

Aerad Chuhyuk waved a dismissive hand and tendered them a wide, bright smile. "Oh, this won't take more than a breath, truly!"

A sudden, teeth-jarring crash resounded from the room behind Jantharl. The boards under their feet groaned and then rippled like a wave crashing on a beach, dust rolled out around them, and the walls creaked and shivered.

All as a prelude to another, greater kerrraaAASH. The boulder was now one floor closer to the cellar.

Chapter 6 Down into the Underruns

In the nigh-deafening tumult, the urhult calmly swept the young man's feet out from under him.

The lantern shattered and went out as it clanged on the heaving floor—and Floonq efficiently bounced Aerad Chuhyuk's head off the groaning boards beside his broken lantern.

The young scribe still smiled, but now he smiled at nothing. Struck senseless.

"Broadsheet scribes!" the urhult snarled, dropping the unconscious scribe and bustling off down the passage. "Dirty spies, all of them! Come!"

"Come where, exactly?" Jantharl inquired, as they hastened along the passage to the front taproom—and what sounded like the pitched battle raging there.

There were crashes and bangs, as if pots and pans were falling or being used as weapons, and the snapping and tearing of wood—and suddenly the passage was full of flapping wings, bird dung, feathers, and excited cooing. Jantharl struck out with one arm, using the pommel of his dagger rather than the blade, and hit at least two birds solidly. "What by the Nine Blazing Hells—?"

"Pigeons," Floonq explained. "Broadsheet scribes send their reports out of besieged castles by pigeon. Most end up in someone's stewpot. Someone must have broken yon young idiot's cage of pigeons."

"How do the pigeons find whoever's waiting for the reports?"

"Most don't. So the broadsheets end up full of whatever nonsense the printers feel like making up. Worry not; it's how sages' histories have been written for centuries."

"I'm not reassured," Jantharl commented.

"You shouldn't be," the familiar told him, scuttling off down the passage. "After all, the alternative is you taletellers."

"Well, this maligned taleteller hasn't failed to notice you haven't answered his question," Jantharl snarled. "Where are we going?"

"Elsewhere," the urhult replied. "Fast."

As they ducked cautiously along the passage toward light—and, by the din, toward general mayhem as well—more boulders crashed down out of the sky, crushing or bouncing off nearby roofs. With a sickening groan, a small building toppled over into ruin, filling the street outside the tavern with wreckage.

Back down the Tongue, a rooftop cistern crashed to the cobbles with a deafening clatter like a wagon-load of spilled shields. Somewhere rather nearer, someone shrieked his throat raw as he fell from an unseen height down, down to a sickeningly wet and abrupt silence.

That silence was immediately broken by several distant crashes, and another long, noisy building collapse.

The siege was raging.

"Dung," the urhult cursed, skidding to a sudden stop. The front of the tavern was gone. In its place was a flood of building stones and jagged timbers. The toppled building had spilled right through The Cursing Priestess.

"We'll have to go this way," Floonq said, abruptly ducking to the right. Jantharl made a grab for it, but missed.

"Will you slow down and answer my question?" he barked—but the familiar had slipped through a dark doorway, and the bard found himself talking to empty air.

Behind him, the minotaur chuckled. "I'm afraid he's always like that."

"It's not a wise career style," Jantharl replied heavily. "Not when I've got my dagger out."

At that moment, a distant boom split the air. He froze, looked vainly back in the direction of the noise, and snapped, "That was a bombard!"

"Oh, aye," Melgor agreed. "The Thayans have several. From Lantan, manned by the crews who made them—who are all utterly deaf, I'm told."

"That's no surprise," Jantharl replied, as they advanced cautiously through the doorway Floonq had taken, his daggers out and ready.

It led through three dust- and rubble-filled rooms, the last of which opened—or rather, had collapsed—into a street. A street filled with heaped stones and bricks that had until recently been the walls of buildings. It was decorated with wet smears and mangled arms and legs that didn't look as if their owners would ever need them again.

"Every year," Tammaszar said gloomily, "the Thayans acquire 'volunteers' on their march through Thesk to our walls."

Jantharl looked at the carnage and winced. "And their volunteer service consists of weighing down catapults?"

He peered more closely at one agonized, staring face, and frowned in disbelief. "A kender?"

The minotaur and Melgor moved to where they could see the corpse he referenced. Their faces acquired a weary look of recognition at the same moment.

"Him," was all Tammaszar said.

The minstrel was a bit more eloquent. "That one was after the book. He wanted to destroy it. Spiritual reasons, or so he said. Sinful to ruin the fun of life with foreknowledge, however limited.”

“And he ended up like this,” Jantharl murmured. “A kender surprise.” He peered around. “Where is that urhult?”

“Here,” a familiar voice snapped, from under their feet. “While you were all sightseeing, I found us a way down into the Underruns.”

“The way-tunnels,” Melgor explained. “They criss-cross under the oldest part of the castle. They were meant to provide cover in winter, in the worst rainstorms, and in times of siege.”

“Well, at least it isn’t winter yet,” Jantharl observed sarcastically. He obediently ducked his head and followed the urhult through an opening half-hidden under a leaning wall, down into darkness. “So where are we headed?”

“Forward,” Floonq answered helpfully.

Jantharl took a firm grip on his patience. “Perhaps,” he suggested pleasantly, “you could be a bit more specific.”

“Deeper.”

Before Jantharl could snarl a suitable reply to that, more boulders hurtled out of the sky to crash down somewhere close by. A hole abruptly opened in the darkness overhead to admit daylight, a little rain . . . and a boulder. This one had a rude verse on it.

“There was a young elf on the moor,” Jantharl read aloud. “A codpiece of shrinking he found . . .”

Then he shrugged and trudged on past, not caring if he ever learned the rest. There was a lewd drawing scribbled on the other side of the boulder.

“Huh,” Melgor commented, scrambling to follow as the hole overhead widened and a trickle of rubble tumbled in. “Orthel will be pleased.”

“Who,” Jantharl asked, as they all went deeper, leaving the daylight behind, “is Orthel?”

“A scribe who’s made it his life’s work to set down everything drawn or written on one of these siege stones in a book. Words from the Heavens, he’s thinking of calling it. He’s likely out right now, scribbling down everything he can find.”

“As long as he isn’t too eager to get a smash hit,” the bard said dryly, “he—”

“Deeper!” the urhult snarled.

“How close are we to the castle dungeons?” Jantharl asked suddenly, turning to Melgor. “I mistrust our guide.”

The minstrel blinked. “Well, they’re much deeper than we are now, and most of them are that way, well east of us. Er, I think.”

“You ‘think’?”

“The old dungeons are well known, but you know how secretive war captains can be. The newer diggings are . . . not public knowledge. Then there’re the sappers.”

“The sappers?”

“The Thayans have a team of gnomes digging for them, siege after siege. They work fast—but have a horrible sense of direction. They double back on their own delving often, going every which way. But they have broken through into the dungeons many times. The breaches were mended by collapsing the rooms and tunnels they’d reached, and digging new dungeons. Deeper.”

Jantharl frowned. “Sounds like a recipe for bringing all of Thaelfortress crashing down, sooner or later. Are you certain of this, or is this all rumor? I’ve never heard of gnomes who don’t have a sense of direction underground.”

“I think it’s having the Red Wizards’ spells in their heads that does it. They’re fighting so hard to be free. Yet that’s just my guess. The breaches and their wandering tunnels, though—that’s simple truth. I saw both with my own eyes when I was working for the Mages of the Dragon Coast.”

“The Mages of—? And who might they be?”

“A sinister cabal of Sembian wizards who are trying to keep the Red Wizards busy. Busy away from Sembia, that is. Some say they goaded the Thayans into the first siege here. Others insist they try to get broadsheet scribes to write about this or not write about that, to sway common opinion. They hired me to do some spying, here in the castle. Through someone else, of course. I learned who I’d been working for four summers later, when the man who paid me was murdered and word got around as to why.”

“Who’d they want you to spy on? And as they did what?”

“Bard!” Floonq’s snarl was menacing. “If you want to stay alive here in this castle much longer, ask fewer questions. Now come on.”

Jantharl flung himself to the floor and swept his legs around in a swift reaping spin. He was rewarded with a startled cry and flailing that ended in a thump, as the urhult was tripped up. He pounced.

“Floonq,” he panted, nose to nose with the familiar he was throttling, “I like urhults. I like you. But I don’t like being ordered around as if I were a slave, when those orders hurry me deeper and deeper into unknown but quite likely dangerous places. Especially when those orders come from someone who avoids answering my questions. Evasion makes me suspicious. Rude evasion makes me suspect hostility. I’m very suspicious right now. And I have a dagger in my hand. Now, do we understand each other?”

The urhult regarded Jantharl unblinkingly—then spat into his eyes.

Or would have, if the bard hadn’t expected it. Alertly ducking and turning his head one direction, he slammed the urhult’s head hard against the passage floor in the other. The smoking, hissing spittle went over Jantharl’s shoulder.

“Who are you working for?” Jantharl snarled at the struggling, squirming creature whose head he had pinned down. Then he and Melgor both remembered that Floonq was the familiar of a mage who was right behind them. Melgor turned in a hurry with his daggers up.

Tammaszar of the Ten Invoked Tempests glared down at the urhult, his nostrils flaring and tiny wisps of what looked like lightning darting between his horns. His eyes were two flaring flames.

"Yes, Floonq," he said very softly, "that's a very good question, to which I require an immediate, full, and entirely honest answer. Besides me, who are you working for?"

Chapter 7 Too Many Tentacles

"Long . . . story . . ." the urhult snarled from under Jantharl's very firm hand.

"We have time," the minotaur said coldly. "Unfold your tale."

"In front of—? Master! Secrets of Thaelfortress!"

Tammaszar leaned down close to Floonq. "Unfold your tale."

The urhult swallowed. "Right. The Mages of the Dragon Coast. They're selling inferior weapons to both sides in these sieges and spying on the Red Wizards to see who's capable. The most dangerous Thayans, they work to maim or slay, and they let the bumblers live."

"So you work for the Dragon Coasters?"

"No. Others entirely."

"Who?"

"There are others who are desperate to get their hands on . . . other things."

"Floonq," the minotaur said pleasantly, "I get just as irked as the bard here at evasive answers. Speak more plainly."

"The monocle on the rat over the festhall? Belongs to Tathtauraunt. It can see through it, from afar. It spies on everyone passing. It saw me. Sent . . . agents to bargain with me. We made an agreement."

"And what did they offer you, to betray me?" Tammaszar's voice deepened, and the lightning racing between his horns crackled.

"Y-your continued life, master. And mine."

The minotaur froze. Jantharl stirred to speak, but Tammaszar flung up one arm for silence. And got it.

"So what does the Beholder Lord of Thaelfortress want with me?"

"Not you, master. Nor me. Though if we bring it what it wants, the deal is fulfilled. It wants the bard. And the minstrel, just in case."

"In case of what?"

"In case the bard says no."

"No to what?"

"I don't know," Floonq replied. "Honestly. I wasn't told."

"That I believe," Jantharl murmured. And he looked over at Tammaszar to find both the minotaur and the minstrel nodding.

"Suppose," Melgor suggested gently, "we go just a little way on, to the cellars under the brewery, and sit down there for a bit more of a talk. Before I go eyeball to eyeball with an eye tyrant, I'd like to know a little bit more. For instance, who else in the castle is an agent of Tathtauraunt?"

The urhult kept silent until its master leaned forward and said, "I heard a question asked of you, loyal Floonq."

The familiar squirmed under Jantharl's grasp. "J-just about everyone who winters in Thael, master. Barring a few of the worst dolts. Oh, and you, master! Everyone. Not that most of them know about the others. Tathtauraunt left most of them thinking they—and they alone—have made pact with it."

"Everyone. So the beholder must have long ago established contact with the mind flayers," the minotaur mused. "Tell me, Floonq . . . have the eye tyrant and the tentacle feeders reached agreement?"

"N-no, master. They're still treating with each other. Most of the dealings are settled."

"Where does Pause stand?"

"She serves Tathtauraunt willingly. Ably, too."

"Who is Pause?" Jantharl asked.

"The illithids' jailer, a tiefling who's preg . . . Floonq, who sired the child Pause now carries?"

"Uh, ah, they say Tathtauraunt, but I don't see how a beholder can—uuurkhhk!"

Glistening mauve tentacles erupted from the floor behind the urhult, uncurling from beneath a stone Jantharl would have sworn was old and solidly set. The tentacles wasted no time trying to ensnare or battle the bard—but thrust right into the urhult's mouth, choking it.

Floonq's eyes started to bulge.

Jantharl's dagger was sharp.

He'd never sliced through mind flayer tentacles before, but they didn't prove much firmer than pudding. Not that he tarried to contemplate their texture. There'd be others, if he knew anything about illithids—

There were. The passage was suddenly full of thin, menacingly striding, mauve figures in grandly sweeping black robes and capes. The illithids hissed angrily as their tentacles writhed and curled, their fell eyes glared malevolently—

And then suddenly their arms were flailing in agony. Tammaszar had unleashed some sort of silent and swift spell that made purple flames gout from the illithids' eyes ere it swept them off their feet and tumbled them down the passage.

"What was that?" Melgor asked in awe. Tammaszar swept its familiar up into its arms like a baby and ripped severed mind flayer tentacles from its mouth.

"A mind lightning spell," the minotaur said grimly. "I don't like illithids."

Shaking the urhult gently, it said, "Floonq? Speak to me of that beagle puppy you like to lick when you meet it. The one you say tastes good. The one that always wants to be walked."

The familiar moaned and drooled. "Awawaaa . . ."

Tammaszar sighed heavily, shook Floonq briskly, and announced, "I haven't time for your little act at the moment. Just answer me plainly. The puppy. You and I both know it's really a malaugrym. Tell me: Is it in league with Tathtauraunt, or a foe, or—

Another volley of catapulted boulders shook the passage, spilling fresh dust and rubble down around them.

"Foe," Floonq replied, all brisk business. It looked at Jantharl. "Thanks for my life, bard. I owe you."

Jantharl nodded. "I'd like us to be friends, not enemies. Allies, at least."

"You bards do dream, don't you?" the urhult replied grimly. "Allies I can manage, given the present circumstances." It looked up at the widening rift in the passage ceiling. The storm clouds were clearing, and boulders could be seen plunging down out of the sky. "Should we, ah, relocate?"

Floonq's question was directed at its master, but Tammaszar turned to Jantharl.

Who replied, "Just back up into the tavern. We'll find what's left of a room somewhere, make sure we're alone, and talk. Then when we have a cunning plan, we'll know to where we should relocate."

"Well said," the minotaur agreed. "Let's be getting back."

"Master, what's happened to you?"

"I guess I got too angry to be shy. You might want to bear that in mind when contemplating future treacheries, Floonq."

"Master! I—"

They stopped in abrupt unison to gape at what came toward them through the heaped rubble of the tavern taproom.

The statue of the dragonborn monk had left her plinth in the mustering yard and lumbered toward them, its steps heavy and ponderous and its eyes staring blankly. "Who am I?" it demanded, its voice deep and echoing.

"Change of plans," Melgor said quickly, plucking at the minotaur's arm. "This way!"

He hurriedly led the way through an underpantry.

"The wine cellar is through there, so there has to be a back stair or delivery hatch or—ah! Here!" He led the way up a steep, curving stair to a closed panel.

Sliding the panel aside, Melgor plunged into a room where a startled ring of robed folk looked up from a chalked design on the floor. An annoyed-looking woman in a gown lay on her back, barefoot, in the middle of the design. Held in the air above her by way of leather restraints was a slumbering, obviously pregnant female tiefling. The four robed worshipers who held the ends of her restraints were chanting something low and insistent.

A chant broke off in confusion as the worshipers all turned to stare at Melgor and his companions.

The minstrel smiled brightly, but rather weakly, and announced, "Oh, I'm very sorry!"

The woman on the floor stared up at Jantharl. "Jan?"

"Oparlra? What brought you here?"

One of the tallest chanters strode angrily toward them. "You profane against Great Sune! This is a solemn ritual, and—"

"No, it's not," the urhult said irritably.

"Excuse me?"

"It's not a solemn ritual. No ritual of Sune is solemn."

The Sunite priestess drew herself up haughtily. "Oh? And just who—what—are you?"

"A servant of Sune," the urhult said flatly. "So bow down and mind your manners."

From behind Floonq, the minotaur let out a snort that sounded suspiciously like a suppressed chuckle.

"Oparlra?" Jantharl was still too astonished to do more than stammer out questions.

The woman on the floor tried to roll out of the chalked design and rise, but found herself pinned under the sagging tiefling as the Sunites holding her turned to gawk at the four intruders. "Get your Pause off me," she snapped at them, startling them into fresh confusion.

"I take it," Tammaszar said to Jantharl, "you two know each other from, ah, before Thaelfortress."

The bard nodded. "We do, and—"

"Say nothing!" Oparlra hissed, rushing up to them the moment she won free. "Nothing at all about me!"

"Ah." Jantharl nodded. "Understood."

"And get me out of here. These Sunites have some odd ideas. I'll need some boots; they took all my clothes."

Jantharl nodded again. "Have you noticed anyone with feet your size?"

"What? No, I've been rather busy, Jan, being dragged into this ritual! I told them I was a consecrate of Sharess, but they say that's—get this!—'close enough!'"

"They dragged you into their ritual unwillingly? Well, then . . ."

Jantharl looked at the boots worn by the priestess angrily arguing with Floonq, and judged them near enough.

Ducking and thrusting an arm around one of her thighs, he boosted the Sunite off the ground in one smooth motion, ignoring her shrieks. Snaring one wildly kicking foot, he tugged the boot off it and tossed it in Oparlra's direction.

"Try it on!" he called, ducking as sharp fingernails raked at his face. Trying to keep his balance under the struggles of the priestess, he staggered back a few steps and turned—only to see the rest of the Sunites charging him.

From mere steps away.

With a curse, he caught hold of the second boot in one hand and heaved the priestess with the other. She hurtled over his head into two of her fellow Sunites, dashing them to the floor. Jantharl fled with the boot.

Behind him, the room went suddenly darker and quieter.

Chapter 8 One Comes, Loudly Heralded, to the Ritual

Ominously darker and quieter—and right behind him.

Jantharl skidded to a halt as he twisted around to see why.

"A smidge large, but they'll do," Oparlra announced happily, snatching the second boot from him. Jantharl barely noticed. He was too busy gawking at the smirking minotaur mage, and what Tammaszar had done.

There was suddenly a wall across the room. A wall that hadn't been there a moment before.

They were on one side of it—and the Sunites and the sleeping tiefling were trapped on the other. Jantharl could feel the floor shake as the angry worshippers crashed into the wall, and the subsequent blows as they hammered on it . . . but he couldn't hear them, or anything at all from the far side of the wall.

"Now, that's a handy spell," he told the minotaur, watching an approving Oparlra stamp her feet into her borrowed boots.

Tammaszar grinned. "You might say it's . . . magic. So your lover, or onetime companion, is a priestess of Shaess."

Jantharl blinked. "Did I say that? Guess I didn't have to."

The minotaur nodded. "Do you trust her?"

The bard frowned. "How do you mean?"

"Can we have our bluntly honest talk in front of her?"

"Oh. Yes."

"Good," the minotaur replied, and he looked down at Floonq. "So let us talk."

"I—uh, well . . ."

Tammaszar sighed, stepped back, lowered his horns, and cast a swift spell. His familiar looked alarmed—and then resigned to what was about to happen.

Floonq flopped to the floor like a boneless thing and started to babble.

"The priestess can't stop bobbing her head . . . They say two of Tathtauraunt's eyestalks are in love with each other . . . the monocle is gigantic because size does matter . . . it belongs to the nearsighted beholder . . . A halfling under a curse that makes him a she, then her a him, then back again; the Sunites were going to cure him, but he trusts them not . . . he loves a sheep . . . 'I only have eyes for ewe!' . . . he stole the scroll under the dragonborn statue, to try to break his curse, but the writings weren't magic at all . . . The mop boy at the Magnificent Mansion of Taste Violations quit after an incident with a corset of custard summoning . . ."

"What?" Jantharl looked at the minotaur. "What is this?"

" . . . the shortage of maids was well noted . . . the fruit carts will have no fruit . . ."

"The spell makes you speak uncontrollably," Tammaszar explained. "Dreams and notions and truth all mixed together. Listen carefully. It doesn't last long, and we'll get only a few useful snatches out of it all."

"When the fruit runs out," Floonq told the ceiling excitedly, "the drow will provide new supplies, up through the dungeons . . . What we still have is spoiled; those who eat it will see wild visions . . . Beware, for someone we thought to be dead yet lives . . . Amole the mighty big-horned barbarian rides his elephant to relieve the siege on Thaelfortress, but afoot he comes barely up to a short man's knee . . . The Thayan commander rides a dragon that's afraid to fly . . . it swallowed a wand of wonder, so its breath is gouts of harmless bubbles . . . but if it spews on you, you're doomed . . . Beware the barbarian who rides a beagle into battle . . . Every third day or so, the book doesn't quite tell the truth . . . In the dungeons is a duck, and under it is the solution to all problems . . . a matched torch lets you lead mobs . . . The alchemist has a homunculus made out of fungus . . . never open his can of wyrms . . . If she gets excited, the priestess will snarl curses and say the most shocking things, and can't stop . . . Beware the weregoat, who works as a nurse; yes, she's a nanny goat, but seven feet tall, and with the voice of the barbarian gods . . . her battle cry is 'You will eat your vegetables!' and she is to be feared . . . I have looked in the book, and on its last page I read, 'And I became as hard as stone' . . . The Thayans have assembled a regiment of curators and statue sellers, who will rebuild Thaelfortress after their siege destroys it . . . Tathtauraunt is madly in love with Helglan the black minotaur, who is as ugly as the hind end of a mangled boar, which just proves that beauty—booty?—is in the eye of the beholder . . . which must be how you get pinkeye . . ."

Jantharl looked at Tammaszar. "You think that's possible? The beholder could be in love with your brother?"

The minotaur mage shrugged. "If it can sire a tiefling's child, I don't know what to believe. This could all be Floonq's speculation, remember. Or nightmares."

The familiar's torrent of words slowed, and its stare grew less wild. " . . . the weregoat loves the halfling, but knows not why he's sometimes a he, and sometimes a she . . . The missionaries seek the sacred writings on the holy boulders that come out of the sky at Thaelfortress . . . There will come a goliath, a fearsome warrior who just wants to dance . . . The fork . . . the fork is in . . . the fork is with you . . . I must pull the fork out!"

The urhult sprang up, shouting, "I must pull the fork out! I must! I must! I must pull the fork out!"

"You must calm yourself," Tammaszar said, gathering Floonq into a bear hug. "Easy now, Floonq. Easy." The minotaur deftly smothered the urhult to the drowsy edge of unconsciousness, then looked at Melgor and Jantharl. "What did you hear that we should heed?"

Chapter 9

Talking and Even Some Thinking

Tammaszar of the Ten Invoked Tempests stood his ground.

"Sport with you? I'm not even flirting with you. Rather, I'm stating my thoughts plainly. And would in turn like some plain answers from you. By 'the right hands,' do you mean you want to seize the book? Or ensure it passes into the keeping of the church of Sune?"

The paladin blinked. "I've been told I should get my hands on the book, yes, but that was by a young and naïve priestess of the faith. The senior priestesses said that I was to make sure the book did not fall into the wrong hands. Who those wrong hands belonged to was left to me to judge."

"Well, it's a safe bet they won't be your hands," the urhult snapped, shifting restlessly in its master's grasp. "What happened to them?"

"Many years ago, I acted rashly. There's a statue in the mustering yard you must be familiar with: the dragonborn monk. Someone placed a garter belt on that statue, and I snatched it off—at the price of my hands. It was an enchanted belt, and the only safe way to remove it, I was informed later, was with my teeth."

"Huh," Oparlra commented. "They always inform you later, don't they?"

"Lady fair, you can inform me later any time," Mandrurjack said affectionately.

Floonq winced and made a loud retching sound. That earned him a stern scowl from his master.

Jantharl rolled his eyes. "Even for a paladin, your lines need work," he muttered. "Get on the wrong side of Oparlra, here, and you're apt to need—"

"Pray pardon, saer bard, but tell me true: Which is her wrong side?" the paladin interrupted, looking grave. "I must know this, for I will be spending much time with you, henceforth, and must needs avoid giving offense to such a charming lady."

The bard and minstrel frowned in unison, then brightened and started to speak. Melgor was a trifle faster.

"There's something hidden under a duck in the dungeons that we have to find. I'm not sure about anything else."

"I'm not sure of anything," Jantharl said with a sigh. "It all sounded like raving to me."

"Well said, saer!"

An unfamiliar voice boomed those words from the entrance to the room, startling them. They turned.

The man framed in the doorway was tall and broad-shouldered—and had no hands. He wore full plate armor—from the stumps where his wrists should have been, to the pointed tips of his boots—and it was shapely, emphasizing his trim waist, curved hips, and muscular chest and thighs. There was a gleaming gorget at his throat, but he was helmless. A lash was strapped stoutly to one forearm and a longsword to the other, and both his breastplate and codpiece were embossed with symbols of the goddess Sune.

"I," he announced grandly, surveying the room with warm, steel-gray eyes, "am here for the ritual. Where is everyone?"

"By 'everyone' you mean Sunites all robed up for worship, I presume?" Oparlra asked.

The armored man's eyes met hers and brightened.

"And who, beauteous lady, are you?"

"Oparlra. A priestess of Sharess."

They all watched a blush suffuse his face. He smiled and asked shyly, "I would be, ah, charmed to better make your acquaintance, lady. Though not . . . as intimately as many of the rituals of your faith prefer, I hasten to assure thee."

Oparlra smiled. "Ah. A virgin in armor. As all paladins of Sune start out. And seeing as your armor is gleaming steel rather than adorned with pink, a status you must still . . . enjoy."

The man in armor winced. "You wound me, lady, when I would fain become your friend—and in time, if you'll have me, more than that."

He looked at the others standing with her and sniffed. "I would be better company, at the very least, than you now keep."

Melgor blinked. "Do minstrels smell or something? Be not so swift to judge, holy knight! Say, now, saer, we know what you are, but how would you be called?"

"I am Elgarr Mandrurjack, a paladin of Sune! And I am on a twofold quest!" At his utterance of that last word, the air filled with a fanfare of unseen trumpets.

"Oh?" Jantharl asked cautiously. "What sort of a twofold quest?"

"I must ensure that a certain book is in the right hands, and I must acquire a certain corset."

The bard quelled his sigh. "Let me venture a guess. A corset of custard summoning?"

"You've seen it?"

"No, but I've heard of one. Locally."

"This 'certain book' you speak of," Oparlra put in. "What sort of book is it?"

"One in which writings of the future appear, that must be read back to front," Mandrurjack boomed.

"I own such a book," Tammaszar told the paladin, before Jantharl or Melgor could shush him.

Mandrurjack frowned. "I'm not sure the notion of a minotaur controlling something of such magical power sits easily with me. You are dressed as one who wields magic."

"I'm not sure the notion of a paladin of Sune presuming to judge me sits easily with me," Tammaszar replied gravely, "so I suppose we're even."

The armored holy knight stepped forward, his whip and sword rising.

"Bull-man, do you sport with me?"

"Spending much—?" Melgor blinked. "You will?"
 "Oh, yes. I must join your fellowship, so as to prevent the book falling into the wrong hands. Even my own."

"But you don't have any hands," the urhult snorted.

"Oh, but I do. My hands live yet—kept supple and moving by the same fell magic that directs them. They run a shop here in Fort Thesk, where dolls are sold."

Melgor frowned. "A doll shop? I've never . . . oh. Is this doll about the height of a middling-stature man? And the same wide?"

"It is."

"Ah." Melgor turned to Jantharl. "The shop where the disfigured dead are prepared for burial with refashioned faces, heads, and the like. Darthemran's, on Lendle Street."

"I'm not likely to become a client," the bard replied dryly. "While still alive, at least."

The paladin frowned at them, and then at the minotaur.

"Are you sure you're the right and fitting person to possess the book that writes of times just ahead?" he asked Tammaszar.

Who replied solemnly, "I am. Now, haven't you a ritual you need to be getting to?"

The holy knight looked at him, then shot a helpless glance of appeal at Oparlra. He coughed. "Yes," he admitted. "And where is it?"

The minotaur mage waved an arm, and the wall behind him vanished. Robed Sunites fell through suddenly empty air, beating their fists on nothing. They set up a gladsome cry at the sight of the paladin, but his eyes were fixed on the priestess of Sharess.

"Elgarr Mandrurjack, paladin of Sune," he murmured, tapping his breastplate with the arm that was fitted with the lash. "Remember me."

Oparlra blew him a kiss. "Oh, I shall."

He gave her a grave nod and strode into the heart of the Sunites—who immediately clamored, "Smite these cruel ones! They interrupted our holy ritual! They imprisoned us here! They—"

As the paladin started to turn, his face hardening, Tammaszar waved his arms and muttered something, and the wall returned, sealing off the Sunites and their half of the room once more.

"Thank you." Oparlra sighed. "I was beginning to fear I was going to have to devote myself to mothering a man with more holiness than wits, and less worldly experience than the nearest milking stool. Who's smitten with me but doesn't know what to do about it."

The minotaur chuckled. "My spell won't last forever. And it'll hold for a very short time indeed if that paladin carries the right sort of divine magic and knows how to use it. Let's get gone."

"Have you noticed," Jantharl said as they headed back down the curving stair into the back rooms of the tavern, "how quiet it's fallen? The bombardment seems to be over."

"For now," Melgor replied, darting cautious glances around the darkened and seemingly deserted tavern. "Which means the Thayans'll be storming the walls. After they get beaten back, about when it's time to prepare evenfeast, they'll start hurling things into the castle again."

"So while this respite lasts, we should go somewhere safer," Oparlra said firmly. "Any thoughts on that?"

"I have one," Floonq piped up. "There's an event that usually takes place in Thaelfortress during the initial assault on the walls that we'll want to keep well clear of: Lord Rustable's Hunt."

"Oh, Watching Gods above," Melgor said slowly. "I clean forgot."

Jantharl got his sigh out of the way as quickly as he could. "And what, pray tell, is Lord Rustable's Hunt?"

"Lord Rorlram Rustable," the minstrel began slowly, "is—"

"Utterly crazed," Floonq said flatly. "A hooting mind prancer. A staring-eyed, raving—"

"Floonq doesn't like eccentric old outlander nobles," Tammaszar explained. "Lord Rustable is a harmless old man with some affectations and a love of hunting. He came here years ago from the Sword Coast. He always holds a hunt inside the castle during the annual Thayan siege. As in, a bunch of wild-armored old nobles on horseback—or off horseback; they spend a lot of time falling off—galloping full tilt through Thaelfortress in pursuit of, well, the lord's pet beagle. Not that they ever catch it, mind you. The whole thing is an excuse for drinking and shouting and falling off horses. The priests who heal for hire encourage it, of course. These days, Rustable spends most of his waking hours tied into a chair so he won't slide out of it whenever he falls asleep. In the saddle, he's a different person. Awake, alive—"

"Manic," Floonq added, in precisely the same tone as his master. "And he can't see much beyond the end of his own nose, so when he's out riding, it's not safe to be anywhere on the same street."

Jantharl stuck his head cautiously out of the deserted tavern to peer down all the streets he could see. They were empty of all but rubble, yet he could hear something—a distant, confused din—off to the east. It sounded a lot nearer than the continuous clash, rumble, and thunder to the south that had to be the battle at the castle walls.

"Is that the hunt I'm hearing?"

"Likely. So we'll want to head somewhere else."

"The Magnificent Mansion of Taste Violations?" Tammaszar suggested with a grin. "It has that enchanted room where things fall up. Could be handy when the boulders start to appear again."

"Can't afford it," Melgor replied. "Besides, I don't want to get anywhere near the troll who works there, ever again. The intellect of the nearest cobblestone, the strength of an angry bull—sorry, Tamm—and thinks she's a sultry little she-elf." He shuddered. "Truly terrifying."

"There's a tale here, I can tell," Jantharl teased.

"Yes, and you're not going to hear it, so leave off. We should be talking of ways to get you safely out of the castle with the book—and without all Tathtauraunt's agents hard on your heels."

"I'm all ears," the bard murmured.

Oparlra chuckled. "That's not how I remember you!"

"You're not helping!" Jantharl told her. "I—" A deep, barely audible thundering sound caught his ear. Frowning, he ducked his head back outside.

And swiftly drew it back, to stare at everyone in incredulous astonishment.

"There's an elephant coming down the street," he announced. "Fast."

"Heh." Floonq scuttled to the door to take his own look. "Amole made it!"

"Through a siege?"

"The elephant opens magical ways—no one knows exactly how."

"So it could become my way out? With the book?"

The urhult smiled. "Now you're thinking. So long as the enchantments on the book don't play havoc with the elephant's portal walking, that should work just fine. We may have to persuade Amole, but—"

"Should work just fine?"

Floonq coughed. "Well, it's never been tried before, so there's only one way to find out."

Jantharl sighed, then peered outside again. "The elephant is coming down yon street this way—fast. The hunt seems to be coming this way on the same street from that direction. Also fast. Charging hard, in fact, both converging forces. Same street."

Melgor chuckled. "I feel a ballad coming on."

"I feel mayhem coming on," Jantharl replied.

"Right outside this door, about three breaths from now. We might want to pick our way across the tavern, find another street, and use it to get well away from here, before—"

Floonq looked out the door again, chortled—and was gone, rushing up the street to confront the beagle that loped along at the head of the hunt.

It saw the urhult and abruptly swerved and ducked down a side alley with Floonq in hot pursuit.

Tammaszar pushed past Jantharl to see what was happening.

"So if Floonq heads the hunt off," Jantharl started, casting a quick glance in the other direction to see how close the charging elephant was, "we can swirl our cloaks and head away in another direction, right?"

The minotaur mage shook his horned head and started across the street, following his familiar.

"No," he said without turning. "We must chase after Floonq."

"Or . . . what, exactly? How can things get worse than they are right now?"

"The dragons could get loose. And Tathtauraunt could find us. Those're just the first two things on a long, long list . . ."

Whatever else Tammaszar of the Ten Invoked Tempests was going to say was lost to Jantharl's ears as the minotaur plunged into the alley.

His jaw dropping open, Jantharl stopped dead in the middle of the street.

"Dragons? You have dragons, plural, imprisoned somewhere here?"

It was at about that moment—with Lord Rustable's Hunt bearing down on him from one direction, and a charging elephant with a tiny man in furs and baldrics and an oversized horned helmet charging at him from the other—that it occurred to Jantharl the Brightsash Bard that standing in the middle of this particular Thaelfortress street at this particular moment might be a less than wise career choice.

As the elephant loomed up like a wall of angry thunder, it lowered its head, pointing one long, curved tusk right at his guts.

Jantharl tried to think of something witty to say as he sprang for the safety of the tavern.

And failed.

Chapter 10 What Happens When It All Comes Together

"Jan!" Oparlra shrieked, shooting out one shapely arm to gather him in. They fell back into the tavern together, Melgor springing politely aside to give them room to do so.

Three hard-running young men, sprinting along at the forefront of the hunt, had seen the beagle turn into the alleyway and took the same route when they reached it.

The rest of the hunt had not—and they raced full tilt into the elephant, even as it charged into them. Bodies flew like embers from a hot fire, or were trampled underfoot, screaming. Polearms shattered like dry twigs against weathered purple-gray hide, spells were shouted, and—

The elephant was gone. The short barbarian plunged down through suddenly empty air to slam into the paunch of a startled horseman with a huge white quivering mustache. From which he bounced high, as the horseman retched, then landed on his feet, snarling defiance at everyone.

"They've noticed the tavern," Melgor reported tersely, "and will head here in a breath or two. Snatch some drinkables, and let's get gone! Heading after Tammaszar, I strongly recommend!"

Jantharl and Oparlra obeyed, liberating a large decanter each from behind the deserted bar without examining the contents of either, and sprinting after Melgor. Melgor dashed into the street, his person already bulging with acquired bottles.

Jantharl flung a random handful of coins back over his shoulder by way of payment and found himself skidding in very fresh elephant dung. He caught his balance with Oparlra's aid, then plunged into the alley without looking closely at the pulped slush that had recently been some of the fastest hunt members.

Melgor puffed and sloshed ahead of them, moving fast despite his bulk. They burst out of the alley, ran across a side street, and plunged into the street of soothsayers. Melgor was panting hard but still two strides in the lead.

"Into the sooth!" he cried. "Onwaaaard!"

The three hastened. Wild-eyed—or blindfolded—bearded faces loomed on all sides of them, bobbing or chanting or tossing handfuls of smooth pebbles back and forth from hand to hand. Soothsayings rose in a cloud of crazed words.

"Seek Kendra the druid, she of the sun-bright hair and wits like a dead sapling!"

"Lubrication or lucubration, 'tis all the same!"

"The curse riding the town crier is that he speaks in puns, or not at all."

"The wizard Cox made the monocle over the fest-hall door, the ring that makes a man a maid and a maid a man, and the corset of custard summoning. Some say the size of the monocle means he's a giant, but others say the size of the corset tells us he's slender and shapely or even a woman. Still others are wise enough to say nothing at all. Me, I'm still undecided."

"Now you know why this was free!"

"He was saved by his enchanted pluterhosen. They inflate when wet, and so saved him from drowning."

"Repent! Repent, and you'll not perish in winter out yonder on the pitted, scarred Lesion Fields!"

"For it is written that the butcher who runs out of meat must take desperate measures!"

"The gods themselves are inspired when a drunken dragon descends to the dungeons—for dun, gin, and dragons is a potent mix!"

"Time lies when you're having fun!"

"Heed ye! That pitchfork was handed down to a farmer from his grandsire, who had it from a traveler—who came across a fork in the road."

"But behold, it was not a pole of dancing, nor yet a lance of kebabing! It was a wooden leg meant for a minotaur! A kender by the name of Shish owned it, and it, the pitchfork of inciting, and the dogapult were a holy trio of relics meant to be wielded in worship together."

"It is written that the kenku monk is easily distracted by shiny things, but, know you, it is not written what sorts of shiny things!"

"Beware the kender, for it is in truth a were-minotaur, who comes out on the full moooooon."

Then Melgor ducked into an alley with Jantharl and Oparlra right behind him. Silence fell, as if the babbling soothsayers were a world away.

"Whew!" the minstrel gasped. "I used to trot along there whenever I needed wild ideas for a ballad or a tall tale for the taverns, but too much of that would make anyone's head hurt."

The alley was a short one, bending in a noisome dogleg brimming with old refuse before turning into a wider, brighter street.

Melgor emerged from the dogleg, sprinting with renewed vigor—only to stumble to an abrupt halt, gaping. Jantharl and Oparlra almost ran into him, but managed their own swift stops and astonished stares.

Ahead, Tammaszar of the Ten Invoked Tempests and his familiar faced, across sixty feet or so of shattered street, four beholders. Each eye tyrant glittered and shone and—Jantharl peered—yes, trailed a stalk or arm that descended down into holes amid the heaped and tumbled cobbles. Which meant they were like four deadly hand puppets, all part of just one notorious, still-buried giant beholder.

So this must be Tathtauraunt, the gigantic beholder, Jantharl thought. Which meant they were almost certainly doomed.

A curious snarl came from the beholder—a growl that steadily rose into a squeal or wail. Its four visible heads were quivering . . . no, shuddering.

Floonq and its master were backing away. Jantharl decided that was a good idea. So did Melgor and Oparlra, and in the space of a few tense breaths they were all back in the alley, around the corner from the beholder and the churning stretch of broken street under which it hid.

"Tamm," Melgor hissed, "what'd you do?"

"Me? Nothing! Played a target, staring at the beholder with my mouth open, that's all!"

"It looks hurt," Oparlra pointed out. "And why didn't it attack you?"

"You saw it glittered? With that shiny coating all over it? Well, that coating is covering all of its eyes. It tried to use one—and the coating trapped the magic in the eyestalk, so it took effect right there, and blew it to wet spatter stew!" Tammaszar winced at the memory. "The coating is pixie blood and enspelled forge dust and . . . other things. Probably something concocted by our local alchemist, Antrus Dralthair. The blast, when the bladder burst above the beholder, looked like his work."

Oparlra's eyes narrowed. "Dralthair . . . wasn't he working with the Thayans?"

"Oh, yes, both sides hire him. We get him working on nastiness to use on the Thayans, and then the Thayans arrive to besiege the castle and hire him to oversee their barrages. Then they go home, and we hire him to think up more nastiness." The minotaur's grin was just short of bitter. "He's a man of mutable standards, and it's steady work."

"Great words for a tombstone," Jantharl observed. "Let's get gone from here. Unless Floonq is still eager to catch the beagle? Where is it, anyhow?"

"It disappeared down one of the fissures, where the street was all broken up. Down there with the beholder," Floonq replied gloomily. "Or in the beholder."

"Where'd the elephant go?" Oparlra asked.

"Halfway across the Realms, if it's lucky," Melgor replied, peering warily in all directions as they came back out into the street of the soothsayers. "They'll soon get hungry here in the castle, you know."

A soothsayer rose, staring at them, and bellowed, "Beware the purple menaces with tentacles, who feed on brains! The beagle is their plaything. They send it around Thaelfortress to entice and lure!"

The bard, the minstrel, the minotaur and his familiar, and Oparlra all exchanged looks.

"For she dwells in a tower, enrapt in beauty and her long, long hair! In love she is, and lets down her golden standards!"

And with that, the soothsayers were all up and clamoring again, shouting their visions and beliefs and corrections of unbridled heresy.

"For time passes differently outside these walls, some days, but not others!"

"Lolth watches and gloats! Truly, the chaos of these sieges is beyond even divine comprehension—but what the Queen of Spiders sees of the blood and tumult that afflicts Fort Thesk, she loves!"

A soothsayer thrust a small purse into Jantharl's hand and hissed, "Use these wisely! Some would fritter these, or hoard them, but you are wise, saer bard, and when the time comes, you will know!"

Jantharl frowned, hefting the small leather bag. It felt like it was full of . . . gems.

"For there were levers around the castle in those days, and whenever they were pulled, the land shifted, and those who attacked became defenders, while those who'd defended now attacked! When they asked Lorthlar of Teflamm why he pulled every lever he saw, the halfling replied that he was a lever-puller born!"

Behold yon figure, on the rooftop! 'Tis Larloch, the Doombringer, come as he comes every year, to watch the death and suffering of the sieges!"

Thrusting the purse he'd been given down his shirt for the nonce, Jantharl looked where the wild-eyed man was pointing and saw a tall, black-robed figure atop a building far down the street. At that moment, the dark watcher turned from gazing out over the distant walls to looking down at the bard—and Jantharl felt a cold regard. He shivered and looked away. When he dared sneak a glance back up, several bellowed dooms and prophecies later, the rooftop was empty.

"This," a soothsayer whispered, close beside his ear, "is what happens when it all starts to come together. The Time of Troubles was nothing compared to this. Believe me."

Jantharl winced. He didn't want to believe any such talk . . . but he was starting to.

May the Watching Gods help us all.

Chapter 11 If a Castle Should Fall

"Come on," said Melgor roughly, tugging at Jantharl's arm to draw him away from the soothsayer. "We'll be getting the missionaries next!"

"The what?"

"Missionaries. Priests of Corellon and Lolth. They pay their way handsomely through the Thayan lines for the privilege of haranguing the besieged folk of the castle. They all hammer on a single door, crying for refuge. Then when it's opened, they start preaching, each priest trying to outshout the other and multiple feet in the door to prevent it being slammed on their noses."

Jantharl shook his head. "During a siege? If I answered the door at all, I'd be inclined to slam not the door but their bodies—with something hard and sharp."

"Oh, they're not just priests, to be put off with skillets of boiling water or flung chamber pots. They're barbarians, armed to the proverbial teeth."

"Charming," the bard commented. "Anything else really cheerful about these sieges I should know about?"

"Well, those gnome sappers will come up some-where before much longer."

"Oh, aye. Anything I should know about them?"

"Very narrow tunnels. If humans need to use them, it's get bare and get greased. We usually use hog fat. They're led by a grizzled old gnome who's more scars than flesh. He covers himself with a mask and strapped-on plates of leather and amulets and the gods alone know what all. Goes by the name of Gustrus More."

"Urrgh. Gnome more, friend Melgor! Next you'll be telling me there're vampires and suchlike."

"Well there are, and lots of 'suchlike.' There's only one vampire, but it keeps to the main castle wells. It guards them, actually. It tore apart an assassin paid to poison the wells years back, and commanded the assassin's bits and pieces be sent back to those who sent him as a warning. We did it, too."

"Now that I approve of," Jantharl replied, letting himself be steered into another alley. "If more folk did that, there'd be less poisonings—and fewer innocent casualties. Poison shows little judgment in selecting foes."

"That corset of the custards used to belong to that vampire," Floonq commented suddenly. "Quite fetching he looked in it, too." It winked. "Well, to an urhult, anyhail."

It turned to enjoy the looks its comment earned it from Jantharl and the others. Then it added brightly, "There are some who say that assassin botched all his jobs because the sight of blood made the man faint. And that he wasn't very bright. The poison he'd bought for the well poisoning was labeled merely "use me," and not knowing how, he poured it on the flagstones, not into the water. Why, there—"

The familiar stiffened, went silent mid-sentence, and ducked into a crouch.

Just ahead of them, Oparlra stopped suddenly. "Peril," she murmured over her shoulder. "Tammaszar, be ready."

"For what?" the minotaur asked, joining her.

"See the woman standing in the corner doorway? On the right, about four cross streets up? That's Hurmeldra Straelstone. She's what they call a chaos sorcerer, and she's a long way short of being sane."

"She's also seen us," Tammaszar murmured. "Should we expect trouble?"

"Seeing as she's worked for the Thayans for the last six years, and is still alive and flourishing, the answer to that one is yes. The more she fights, the more she slips into madness. She already has some sort of spell at work—see the shimmering in the air around her?"

"I don't have the spells to shield us all, or even counter her if I don't know what she's cast," the minotaur warned. "We should scatter—sidling casually, not running. If we stand together, we make a tempting target for—"

He blinked. The distant sorcerer was gone from the doorway.

And suddenly standing right in front of them, her arms still folded across her chest and her eyes contemptuous.

"Well met," she purred, almost sneering. "A curious fellowship to meet here in the streets of Fort Thesk. I wonder if you might happen to have what I'm seeking?"

Everyone fell silent and waited. Neither Straelstone nor those facing her said a word until Jantharl sighed and asked aloud, "And what might you be seeking, lady?"

"A ring that makes a maid into a man, and a man into a maid. A corset that summons custards. And a certain book."

Her eyes bored into those of the minotaur, who stared back at her without a word. Tammaszar's eyes might have been two sword points.

"A love of literature is always good," Jantharl drawled. "What's your interest in this 'certain book,' if I may be so bold . . . ?"

The sorcerer laughed lightly. "I have a pen that will write in it, Brightsash Bard."

Jantharl crooked an eyebrow. "You have the advantage of me, lady."

"Ah, but it's gratifying to finally meet a man who knows his limitations. I do indeed. So to avoid unpleasantness, you might want to surrender the book rather than forcing me to do . . . violence."

"To avoid unpleasantness," Floonq snapped, "you might want to refrain from casually uttering threats to folk who outnumber you."

The chaos sorcerer's smile was cold. "As I recall, urhults feel great pain when . . ."

She had lifted her fingers and was almost lazily forming an image in the air when a knife whirled out of the passing air and sliced two of them almost off.

Straelstone shrieked and clutched at her spurting hand. Floonq swarmed up her body and clawed at her throat. She fell back, grabbing at the urhult. She managed to fling it away—just as Tammaszar smiled tightly and unleashed a spell that took her suddenly elsewhere.

"Where—?" Jantharl asked him, staring at the empty cobbles where the menacing woman had stood moments before.

"There's a shrine to Tempus in one of the castle towers," the minotaur replied, watching his familiar rise and dust itself off. "During the sieges, there are always several priests of the Lord of Battles in residence—and a steady stream of worshipers, too. Dominating its sanctuary is a large spiral stair that rises from the main floor to the holy armory. That stair is guarded by several pairs of knights in full plate. The knights are stationed on various steps, including the topmost. Which is where I sent her, to arrive head down. The rest should work itself out quite nicely." He turned to Oparlra. "Nice throw."

The priestess of Sharess shrugged. "I practice." She went to retrieve her dagger. "And I knew Hurmeldra was here in the castle to cause trouble. I . . . remember her, from years back."

"Oh?" Floonq asked, licking the blood off Oparlra's dagger before offering it to her.

"Oh," Oparlra replied flatly, accepting her weapon. "She has lots of piercings. Take that as you will."

Something hurtled out of the sky and splattered all over the front of a building farther down the alley. Then the streets were full of more wet splattered things. Floonq sniffed the air. "Goblins," he announced.

"They never learn," Oparlra told him. "Siege after siege. They wait until things get going, then demand higher pay, thinking they're catching the Thayans at a time of need. The Thayans promptly start loading them into the catapults. A minor problem promptly dealt with, so to speak."

There were more splattered goblins, all around.

"Charming," Jantharl muttered again. He watched Floonq make a gesture, and Tammaszar nod gravely in response. The familiar turned and scampered away.

"No, follow him not," the minotaur rumbled as the bard and the minstrel both turned to follow the urhult. "He'll be right back."

"Secrets, Tamm?" Melgor said sadly. "After all we've been through, thus far this day?"

The minotaur mage shook his head. "He's just retrieving the book."

"Retrieving it? You lost it?"

"I contrived to lose it, as the hunt approached. Now it's best back with us."

"You were worried about the hunt?" Oparlra asked in disbelief.

"One of the priests of Oghma read from the book a few days back. It was the last thing he did before fleeing the city. He broke his vow of silence to warn me the book might go astray if I took it across the path of the hunt, so . . .”

“You believed him?” The priestess of Sharess frowned.

“He broke his silence. And he was right about the return of Amole, the so-high barbarian. Or rather, the book was.”

“Sooner or later—probably sooner—you’re going to have to read the book yourself, you know,” she warned him.

The minotaur gave her a grim look. “I know. And there’s nothing that terrifies me more.”

The spattering sounds suddenly gave way to great castle-shaking booms. Dust rose, and pebbles and small stones fell from the surrounding buildings as the streets heaved.

“Bombardment, again.” Melgor sighed, scrambling hastily to the nearest wall.

There were fresh explosions, and the street heaved again.

They watched soothsayers rush everywhere in the distance, gesticulating and shouting.

“Noisy idiots,” the minstrel muttered. He watched the soothsayers wave their arms wildly while bellying in a fanatical frenzy of fearful cajoling and explaining.

“They so often misconstrue,” Tammaszar agreed, watching the yelling men milling around.

Then the distant street erupted, right in the midst of the soothsayers. The front of a building went down in a rush, a flood of stones and bricks and tumbling balconies . . . and then there was no more rushing around or yelling. Only the faint crashes of broken brick landing here and there.

“After that,” Melgor observed in dry tones, “they’re misconstrewn everywhere!”

Oparlra punched Melgor’s arm in disgust at the quip.

The next bombard blast was uncomfortably closer, blinding them all with billowing dust. Roof tiles and slates crashed down in the wake of the explosion, bursting around them like small bombs . . . but all the blasts that followed were far away, south and east near the castle walls.

It seemed like an eternity before Floonq came trudging into view, cresting one heap of brick rubble after another, a book in its hands.

“What took you so long?” the minotaur rumbled sharply.

“Tathtauraunt’s going to be angry,” the urhult said brightly, by way of reply. He stopped in front of Tammaszar and proffered the book. “That bombard crew from Lantan scored a direct hit on the rat statue over the door of the festhall. Beheaded it.”

“Well, you’ve got to get a head in this world,” Jantharl and Melgor murmured in sardonic chorus.

Earning them a withering look from Oparlra. “Wasn’t funny the first time, jacks,” she informed them.

“Worse than that,” Floonq said cheerfully. “The monocle’s blown to bits. Leaving the eye tyrant nigh-blind. It’s as nearsighted as the nearest dung fly.”

“Huh. Folk aren’t going to be pleased if they can’t get into the festhall, that’s for sure,” Melgor commented.

The urhult grinned. “So the front’s a shambles—and right now, there’s flaming chaos raging inside. The gnome sappers—all greased to get through their tunnels, with dirt and stone dust sticking to them—came up through the floor of the enchanted weightless room. The lasses started screaming about an invasion by demons from the Abyss, so someone dragged the Sunites away from the few bottles and casks they hadn’t drunk yet in the tavern and got them to try a banishing ritual. That failed, of course, and now everyone’s fighting. That troll that believes she’s a sultry she-elf thinks a mage cast invisibility on her during the brawl, so now she’s out running around the streets, smacking into folk and triumphantly telling them they don’t see her.”

Melgor shook his head incredulously. “Just who—all right, besides us and the hunt and the soothsayers—is crazed enough to be out on the streets during this bombardment?”

“Dying Thaelans,” the urhult said merrily. “There’re a lot of them. The poison, remember? Humans do like to eat, you know.”

“Floonq,” Tammaszar said quietly, “what are you trying to pull?” He held out the book his familiar had just handed him. They could all read its title: 101 Inappropriate Uses for Sovereign Glue.

The urhult’s face fell. “Oh, no. Someone must have been watching. They must have stolen the book and put that in its place. Oh, dung.”

“Oh, dung, indeed,” the minotaur echoed grimly.

“So now what do we do?” Jantharl asked.

With no answers on their faces at all, everyone looked at him.

Just before the world exploded.

Chapter 12 The Demon and the Fork

Out of an eternity of tumbling fire, Jantharl cart-wheeled in and out of half-remembered moments. In his dream, if dream it was, someone was strumming a harp randomly somewhere, and someone else was shouting.

“Jan? Jan!” It was Oparlra, and she sounded upset. So Jantharl swam past a cracked throne in a wavering turret that just had to be some unfamiliar part of Thaelfortress, heading for the nearest door. Her cries seemed to be louder in this direction. Around him, the besieged warriors suddenly all had doubles among the besiegers—and someone pulled a lever that made a defecting, fleeing Thael warrior turn and run back to the castle he’d just fled from. . . . Leaving that confusion behind him, Jantharl swam right through the closed door. Her shouts were coming from just ahead . . .

The waverings around him became wild rippings, and it was much brighter. He blinked in suddenly blinding brightness . . .

"He's alive! Thank the gods, he's alive!" Oparlra cried, and Jantharl's mouth was suddenly covered with moist, warm lips he remembered. Arms tightened around him, and—and—

There was cloudy gray sky above him, framed by rather battered-looking buildings. Tammaszar and Melgor leaned over him.

"Thought that'd do it," Floonq said in satisfaction. "Bards get kissed so seldom that they always wake up so they won't miss it, when they actually do get some."

"Urhult," Oparlra commented, looking up from Jantharl, "belt up, or I'll belt you up. I do have some pain-is-pleasure spells, you know."

"That's right, threaten the urhult. That'll show how mighty and imperious you are. Men will quake in fear, or swoon in helpless lust."

They all watched warily, as Oparlra's fiery glare started to shift, and one of her hands rose slowly, motes of aroused magic winking softly around it, building. Her soundless snarl wavered, trembled, and burst into sputters of helpless mirth.

She looked around at the minotaur, the minstrel, and the bard beneath her. "Well? Start swooning, then!"

It was at that moment that the rubble beside her lifted. Broken bricks tumbled, and tentacles of glistening purple emerged, reaching for Jantharl. Cruel, long-nailed purple claws burst out of the stones to clutch at him.

Oparlra, twisting around on her knees to face this new menace, found herself nose to tentacles with the cold-eyed head of a mind flayer.

"Haven't you learned yet?" she snapped, as tentacles reached for her head in a deadly whirlwind. And she breathed a blue-white searing spell right into those baleful eyes.

The mind flayer gave off a high-pitched squalling as its mauve flesh darkened to a horrible greenish black. An appalling stink arose, wafting on wisps of smoke or steam. Between wary looks around for signs of other illithids emerging from the ground, they all watched those cold eyes go dark and sightless. The tentacles writhed in slow spasms of pain as they curled, retracted, and sank.

"I hate mind flayers," Oparlra announced. "A mind is a horrible thing to waste."

Rubble shifted nearby, and she turned and calmly called down a flame strike. A roaring column of flame flashed down, then seemed to suck stones and bricks and convulsing robed and tentacle-mouthed bodies up into its heart. The mind flayers had little time to shriek as they cooked.

"The Sunites," Melgor said grimly. "They took Pause away from her duties for their ritual, leaving the illithids to their own devices for too long."

"And just what are those devices?" Oparlra asked. "Do they want to rule in Thaelfortress, or make common cause with the Thayans? Or should we be standing back and letting them destroy the Thayans for us?"

The minstrel shrugged. "I don't think we dare wait to find out. They're always hatching plans—in which humans are always food."

"I talked to one of the imprisoned mind flayers, once," the minotaur mage said slowly, "and it claimed Tathtauraunt was a construct built by its kind. A failed attempt to create an eye tyrant equivalent of an elder brain."

"So would Tathtauraunt be able to sense that illithids just died, right here?" Floonq piped up. "If so, shouldn't we . . ."

"I think relocating would be a superb idea," Jantharl said, rolling out from under one of Oparlra's shapely legs and getting to his feet with a grunt and a slight stagger. Nothing seemed to be broken, and . . .

"Too late!" That shout came from the foremost of two hulking men in armor. They had just stepped out of an alley farther down the street. Clapping their visors down, they drew long, heavy swords and strode toward Jantharl and his companions.

"Oh, dung," Oparlra commented, looking back behind her and finding nothing but rubble there. "Let's get gone. Time for a good, invigorating 'flee for our lives' chase through the castle. We should be able to outrun these dolts."

"But that's away from the book," Tammaszar protested.

"Away from where the book was," Floonq pointed out. "I very much doubt it's there now."

"Good point," the minotaur admitted.

The five companions all turned and started to trot through the shifting rubble, away from the advancing pair in armor. The urhult was light enough to scamper along, but it was a nightmare of wading and slipping for the others.

Luckily, the pursuing men in armor were even slower.

Unluckily, as the companions reached the next alley, someone stepped out in front of them, leveling a pitchfork menacingly.

"Ye Watching Gods, what next?" Jantharl muttered. "Now they're sending farmers after us."

The man with the pitchfork had a fierce double-tusked mustache, sad and sunken eyes, and the weathered hands and well-worn clothes of a heave-dirt crofter.

He faced them like a battle champion who had a mighty army behind him.

"The pigeon," he informed them in a voice of doom, "hath visited me."

Jantharl gave him a swift smile before Floonq could offer its snide one. "That's nice," he said evenly. "And what does that visit portend?"

"I was on my knees in the furrows, praying to Chauntea for good crops," the farmer replied, "and the pigeon came with its message and landed on my head. Brining word straight from the gods. I heeded, obeyed, and so am here on the holy mission I was charged with. To rally any dismissed besiegers to me to break the siege, to deliver the good folk of Fort Thesk, and to rid the soil of our fair land from the blighting tread of the undead and unholy Thayan invaders!"

He thrust the pitchfork forward meaningfully, letting them see its gleaming tines.

"We're not Thayans," Oparlra informed him.

"We're some of the folk of Fort Thesk."

"And that's the cleanest, best-made pitchfork I've ever seen," Tammaszar added. "Wherever did you get it?"

The farmer frowned at the minotaur suspiciously, then peered down at his pitchfork. He frowned more deeply. "I don't hold with talking animals," he muttered, "but hrast me if this isn't my pitchfork at all! Yet it was . . . it was the only one leaning against the wall where I always leave mine. Feels the same, hefts the same, but . . . highly irregular. Hrasted suspicious, in fact."

He peered up at them. "And I see a talking man-bull, some sort of little goblinkin, and a woman and two men. And the two humans who've spoken thus far aren't from around here, to be sure. So you're not folk of the castle."

Melgor gave the man his best scowl. "Aren't we, now? And who does a Westslope farmer think he is, to be telling a man born and bred in the castle that he's not of the castle?"

"Minstrel, leave off! You, I know. And you've spent a few months a year here, and all the rest of your life off gallivanting around the Realms, picking up who knows what all crazed ideas and outlandish ways. You're not the innocent, hard-working, huddled-in-their-homes Thaelans I've come to rescue."

"Well, you'll have to make do with us," Floonq snapped, "because all the folk you're talking about—if they've eaten any fresh bread or sausage rolls or pies these last two days—are dead."

"As you will soon be, if you're who I think you are," boomed a hollow voice from behind the five companions. It came from inside the helm of the foremost of the two plate-armored warriors.

The two hulks of metal stalked up over the last heap of rubble. Their swords and daggers were drawn, cutting off any retreat Jantharl and his friends might have contemplated from the pitchfork. Which was starting to glow, now, not just gleam . . .

Floonq was already moving forward. No matter how truculent, one farmer with a pitchfork was less of a foe than two warriors in full plate. And a leap that was just right might well end in its catching hold of the farmer's mustache, allowing it to cling there, raking that bulbous red nose with its claws while its friends rushed past . . .

"Maeroch!" one of the warriors gasped. "Look! Yon pitchfork—can it be?"

Tammaszar whirled to look at the two warriors, dragging Oparlra back as he did so. She shot him a furious look, but she was off balance and stumbling backward. The bard and the minstrel moved smoothly with her, leaving Floonq facing the farmer alone.

The urhult blinked, saw its isolation between the armored warriors and the farmer, and scampered to join the others. The farmer reached after him with the pitchfork, but then turned his attention to the advancing warriors.

"Yes!" Maeroch agreed, his voice suddenly deeper and hungrier. "It can!" He advanced swiftly.

"Stay back!" snapped the farmer. "Stay back, or I'll—right, I warned you!"

As the fork jabbed out, Maeroch flung his sword in the farmer's face—and grabbed the tines thrusting at him.

There was a flash, a roar of ascending flame, a delighted bellow of laughter from inside the warrior's helm, and—

Tammaszar of the Ten Invoked Tempests leaned forward and shouted a spell.

There was a greater flash, a wild scattering of sparks—and Maeroch was gone.

"Thought so," the minotaur said in satisfaction. "Behold—one demon sent back to the Abyss, just as he regained his powers! Deftly done, if I do say so myself."

The remaining warrior snarled angrily inside his helm and advanced on them. The bleeding farmer stopped cursing and staggering and wringing his empty, smoking hands. And Jantharl gave Tammaszar his best exasperated look.

"I realize this is far from the most opportune time, but I'm afraid my patience has run out. Saer wizard, will you please tell me what, by all the Watching Dancing Gods, is going on?"

Chapter 13 Some Attempted Explanations

Floonq groaned, rolled its eyes, and looked up at its master.

"Please don't," it said. "My head still hurts from your last, er, attempted explanation."

"Then I'll keep it short," Tammaszar snapped. "Maeroch is a demon. I'd heard about him. He was summoned here by one Skelznyn, lately of Tsur-lagol—and when the priests of the city found out what Skelznyn had done, they called on the gods to task him to accompany Maeroch and keep him out of trouble. Isn't that right, Skelznyn?"

The remaining warrior stopped, sheathed his dagger with an angry jerk, and used his freed hand to doff his helm.

"They did more than that," he said sourly. "Those meddling holynoses laid bindings on Maeroch that left him not knowing who he was, or how to wield his powers. Making him useless to me. Unless he laid hands on an enchanted item of the Abyss and used its power to break the bindings. That pitchfork was one such. And you ruined it, man-bull! For which, old foe, you will now pay the price! I should have done this years ago!”

Pointing his sword at Tammaszar as if it were a lance, he snarled an incantation. Purple lightning burst into being, racing up and down its blade, ever swifter and brighter.

The minotaur mage started shouting out a spell, and Oparlra hissed an incantation, too—but into the purple crackling heart of it all charged the farmer, roaring out prayers to Chauntea and defiance to demon summoners in one long, incoherent raging breath.

Lightning stabbed him and coiled around him, sending him dancing involuntarily. But he kept coming, his hands blackening and his gashed face dripping with blood. He struck the purple sword aside with one blow, and sent Skelzbyn reeling with another. Lightning stabbed out to rake defenseless rubble rather than living foes.

By then Tamm's spell had made Skelzbyn's armor red-hot, cooking him alive inside, and Oparlra's spell had enveloped Skelzbyn's head in a cloud of whirling incense, making him cough and weep and choke uncontrollably.

Skelzbyn staggered back on shifting stone, slipped, and fell. He tried to shriek with pain but lacked the wind to do so. What came out was a horrid, strangled whooping sound. Even that ended when the dying farmer toppled, crashing down atop Skelzbyn's head with all his weight.

“Well, master,” Floonq observed in the sudden silence, “you're certainly maintaining the usual body count that tends to surround you.” They watched the last few purple sparks die out around the sword Skelzbyn still clutched. “We'd better find somewhere to sit down and hide before anyone else comes charging up to engage in dastardly battle with us. We need some time to think, to try to decide where to look for the book—remember the book?—before . . .”

“Too late!” a new and heavily accented voice roared from behind them. “Amole is upon you, recreants! Decadent city scum! What have you done with the pitchfork? Aye? Hey? One of you will aha-tell me, or all of you will aha-die!”

The barbarian who bellowed at them waved his dagger menacingly as he spoke. He wore furs, badly made furred boots, crisscrossing baldrics a-bristle with what looked like small kitchen knives, and a two-horned helmet as tall as he was.

He seemed to come up to about the height of Jantharl's knee.

It was the man who'd been riding the elephant.

“Where is that pitchfork?” Amole bellowed, his voice an astonishingly loud warhorn-like blare for such a tiny man. It echoed off the walls around them. “I love that pitchfork! I see it bobbing behind the hay bales, and I'm in love-aha!”

Oparlra sighed and made a swift gesture while murmuring something. The barbarian fell still and silent in mid-roar. And he then literally fell, toppling over because he'd been charging at them, and had one leg raised in mid-stride. He lay there like a little glaring statue.

“This,” the priestess said in exasperation, “is Amole. He's not been the same since he got whacked on the head last year with a giant's club, while he was singlehandedly defending the castle walls.”

“Well,” Jantharl observed, “that makes him fit right in around here.”

Oparlra gave him a hard look. “Between the missionaries and the hunt, last year, there was a time when there were no defenders on the walls—except Amole. There he was, leaping up and down to try to look over the ramparts. All the Thayans saw were those two horns on his helmet bobbing into view, then falling out of sight, then bobbing up again. Word around the castle is that the Thayan commanders got into quite a heated debate about when and where to assault the walls. Some of them thought a huge trap had been prepared, because no one would otherwise be stupid enough to leave the walls undefended.”

Melgor snorted. “Yet they attacked, all right. And I don't believe the embellishment about the rude gesture for one instant. We're talking Thayans, remember?”

“What embellishment?” Jantharl asked, backing away from the toppled barbarian. “How long is he going to stay like that, by the way?”

“If none of us touch him, until sundown,” Oparlra replied. “And as the embellishment has it, the Thayans thought the bobbing horns were a rude gesture meant for them, so they attacked.”

“Wars have started for sillier reasons,” Melgor observed.

“So they have. Bah. Let's head for the Cursing Priestess, or what's left of it,” Tammaszar suggested. “I'm getting thirsty.”

“Brilliant idea, master,” Floonq piped up.

The minotaur gave him a dark look. “You brought back the wrong book,” he reminded his familiar.

“To err is human, to forgive, bovine!” Floonq replied brightly.

“Which reminds me,” Oparlra said, giving the urhult a glare to quell any further flippancies it might be thinking of making. “That book has been—was—yours for some time. Tell me, what happens when you try to read it in the usual manner, from front to back?”

“It makes your eyes go funny,” Floonq said. “My master was stumbling around rubbing at his for a day and a night. Left him a little nearsighted.”

“So you have looked in the book!” Melgor pounced.

Tammaszar sighed. “Of course I have. Looked inside, not read it. As I recall, the script changed at one point, from tongue to tongue. To something I couldn't read.”

"But before that," Jantharl put in, "what did the passages you could read say? Were they a string of separate prophecies or pronouncements, dark hints about the Three Who Wait and so on, or did they tell a tale?"

The minotaur shrugged. "I told truth when I said I looked, rather than read it. I really don't know."

"Talk around the castle says it tells the story of a siege," Melgor offered.

"The current siege, always," Floonq corrected.

"In my temple," Oparlra said, surprising them all, "the senior priestesses say Lanthroanra's Unfolding Lament is a thing of evil. The words that appear in it are the work of an evil, malicious sentience. It often writes about the means of its own destruction, but these writings are invariably lures to mislead the unwary to their own doom. Attempts to destroy the book guided by its own contents are always embarrassing, often fatal, and never successful."

"That's not surprising," the minotaur told her.

"There's more," Oparlra told him. "They assert that the reason so many bizarre things befall the castle is because the book is here. It's corrupt and degrading, warping the very Realms around it. That's why so many folk want to destroy it. They feel its influence, and instinctive revulsion seizes them. They want to be rid of it, now."

"And are you one of them?" Floonq asked, scuttling to where it could bar her way and force an answer.

The priestess of Sharess regarded the urhult thoughtfully. "I don't know." She gave him a wry grin. "I think hosting many bizarre happenings is the very nature of Thaelfortress, book or no book."

Melgor grinned. "Well said."

They clambered over more rubble—and discovered themselves amid the soothsayers again.

"But those who stuff and preserve dead animals will be struck with terror when Lord Rustable brings back what he slew while hunting!"

"What Thaelfortress needs is a good chase! For know you that the walls around us, the cobbles beneath our boots, and even the rainspout gargoyles have an internal blood we cannot see. And like us, they need their blood stirred from time to time to sluice away the sloth and shame and confusion that builds up like detritus in a cellar corner, so that the castle can truly live!"

Wincing, heads down, they hurried through the din. Wild-eyed, long-bearded soothsayer after unwashed soothsayer pressed close to them, earnestly trying to convey the burden of his thoughts to this returning audience.

"Yet among the Thayans outside our walls is one who desires in his heart to join us, to live in the castle and defend it against his fellows! Like all Thayans, he finds truth a frightening thing, and he is no convincing liar. The time will come when he will run backward into our midst, unable to tarry longer in the grip of the evil that is Thay! Those who hail from Lantan and who are hard of hearing will hear him confess his shifting loyalties, but because they hear not well, will misunderstand."

"Gods above," Jantharl muttered to Melgor, "some of these madwits sound almost . . . enlightened."

The minstrel opened his mouth to reply—and a soothsayer thrust his face right into Melgor's and bawled, "If it was a kender minotaur, we would know who moved my cheese!"

The sidelong look the minstrel gave Jantharl was silent but eloquent.

The next soothsayer's words startled everyone.

"Is it too early to destroy the book?"

Chapter 14

Blasphemy and Some Solutions

"Blasphemer!" the next soothsayer bellowed. He swung his fists with vigor, clubbing to the ground the one who'd asked about destroying the book. Others enthusiastically joined in the pummeling, rushing into a great knot of punching, stamping, shouting men.

"Well, there goes any chance of questioning that one," Jantharl called to his companions. Everyone except the urhult nodded, and they fought their way on.

Straight into the heart of another knot of hard-shouting soothsayers, who seemed in good voice right then.

"Yet it is written that in time to come, the dragon, worse for drink, shall end up in the sewers, fighting the illithids, and that combat shall decide the fate of worlds!"

"And the paladin laid on hands, was withered, and despaired. Priests of his faith spoke to him, saying, 'Behold, this that you have found is the Hand of Vecna, and verily as long as you bear it, you shall walk alone, and have no wife!'"

"And that kender had no doppelganger, but fled from world to world, because it was pursued by a lovelorn suitor. This suitor was a bard who used only the name 'Elvish' and forever sang a ballad he called 'Love Me Kender,' that made the kender wax wroth and know horror at one and the same time . . ."

"Then let it be known across all the lands that the beagle ended up in a butcher's shop, only to have the butcher who coveted the lance of the kender kneel before him. The butcher venerated the beagle and sought to deliver him from the siege by the covert use of a dogapult. Then did the tiny barbarian espy the beagle and deem it his war-steed. He rode off upon the beagle with the butcher in tow. Or toe; the writing is unclear. At least I think it says toe, but . . . a moment, please . . ."

"For the root of all that troubles the castle is a court crier, who keeps trying to prevent happenings that must befall if the present tale is to end!"

"For the truth can now be revealed! The half-orc and the half-elf were half-brothers. Their mother gave her name as Tuckaer Orfalconer, and made her living plucking chickens.”

“The spy came from the dungeons, through the sewers, to the royal gardens, where he remained for years, posing as a statue. Got away with it for years!”

“Beware! For as she said, though too few believed her, it will return when least expected!”

“For it has been foretold that the tiny barbarian shall carry a torch for the farmer, and so the flame shall be borne onward!”

“And the book of truths shall be called Time and Innocence, Once Lost, Can Never Be Regained. And it shall correct misspellings, and so seek to prevent wild magic.”

“The invisible troll shall escape and live happily ever after!”

“The armies that beset and oppress Thaelfortress are linked to the liar, and he shall be held responsible for their deeds by the gods, in time soon to come!”

“And if ever the corset of custards and that bomb are brought together, the castle will go up in flans!”

“Really? Now that, I’d want to experience!” Floonq replied to the last saying, as the five companions burst out of the din and hastened on down the street.

They reached the next cross street just in time to see a donkey cart rumble past with three illithids standing in it.

A trio of mind flayers who turned, made mocking gestures, and held up a book for the five companions to see.

It was Lanthroanra’s Unfolding Lament.

One of the illithids opened the book, read something aloud in a horrible, liquid language, pointed one of its hands at a nearby building . . . and the building slumped down in a flood of rotting slime.

The other mind flayers waved merrily at Jantharl and the others as the cart rumbled away.

“After them!” Tammaszar bellowed unnecessarily. Everyone was already sprinting after the cart.

Before that moment, Jantharl hadn’t really thought about whether mind flayers could smile or not. Just then, he discovered that they could. Nastily.

“There they are!” bellowed a deep voice from somewhere far behind them. “Open fire!”

That didn’t sound good. Jantharl skidded to a stop and spun around.

To stare into the distant sneer of a giant in full armor. The giant stood outside the castle walls and looked down at them from the other side.

Jantharl grabbed Oparlra’s shoulder and shoved her sideways, into Melgor—pushing both of them toward the cross street they were just passing. They looked back in time to see the first big bombard from Lantan.

It smote their ears like an iron fist, echoing off the castle walls and turrets and the mountains behind them. After that first brutal blow, they could hear only faintly, through a muted jangling ringing. The bombard was literally deafening, so they felt rather than heard the terrific crash of its ball, farther down the street.

On its way, that projectile had neatly beheaded one of the mind flayers in the cart. The headless mind flayer’s body spurted dark gore in all directions and wavered back and forth like a boneless thing. Its two fellow illithids grabbed hold of the headless illithid from either side and tried to hold it up—and hang on, as they hauled hard on the reins of the terrified donkey. The donkey dragged its burden around in a rough and rattling curve, into a side street.

“If we run down this street for a block, then cut up the next one, we should end up on their tail again,” Tammaszar bellowed. His voice sounded like a faint and hollow echo in Jantharl’s ravaged ears. “That’ll get us away from that bombard, until it’s aimed anew.”

Oparlra nodded as she ran, all of them sprinting along with her. They went down to the end of the block, then turned left sharply, into the street.

Where they heard a sound that was chillingly familiar, thanks to the past battles and sieges all of them had lived through. The thrumming, hissing sound of a great volley of arrows in the air. Followed thankfully by the thudding and cracking of all of those shafts striking the cobbles far in their wake. The Thayan bowmen couldn’t match the distance of the bombard’s throw.

Looking back toward the castle walls, they saw a lone figure in the street. A gnome, who was rapidly becoming a pincushion amid the last of the falling shafts. As he staggered and then fell, Melgor winced and gasped, “Gnome on the range.”

“Just be glad we’re beyond their reach.” Oparlra panted, still running hard.

“What I want to know is how we’re going to get the book from a pair of mind flayers!” Tammaszar bellowed. “I don’t even know if we can catch them!”

“I don’t know why we’re crazed enough to try,” Jantharl shouted back.

“Because we—I—like it here, and don’t want Thaelfortress ruined beyond repair or changed into some sort of Thayan prison or mind flayer citadel. You can write ballads about the struggle to prevent that—and our glorious victory!”

“Or gallant defeat,” Jantharl muttered, knowing he’d be unheard among all the hard breathing, the cracking of shifting shards of brick and stone underfoot, and the din from the castle walls.

Up ahead, there was a sudden bouncing clatter as the donkey cart carrying the illithids raced across the street, heading back toward the mustering yard. Something fell—no, was tossed—from the conveyance.

The dead, headless mind flayer sprawled wetly on the cobbles in front of them. Just for an instant, Jantharl met the chill gaze of the illithid that had tossed the corpse.

And found himself shivering. It held a cold, clear warning.

"Stlarning monsters," Oparlra hissed beside him. "I'll be lashed and blasted by Sharess herself if I'm going to let them take the castle away from us, or change it, or—come on!"

She turned onto a side street that was free of rubble and started to really run. The others pelted after her.

"There's a . . . tale I've heard, master," the urhult gasped, racing beside Tammaszar, "that if you open the book in front of the statue and hold it up, the statue—who edited the book, or wrote it, or some such—will read it aloud. Then, both the book and statue will . . . disappear. Mayhap that's . . . what the tentacle-faces are going to try!"

"I've heard lots of tales about the statue and the book, Floonq," Tammaszar replied grimly. "They can't all be true. All I know is that we can't let them slip away with the book, leaving us having to hunt for it. We must—"

The air in front of them glowed, a radiance that disgorged a dozen wild-eyed, bearded men and then vanished as swiftly as it had come.

The soothsayers, charging at the five companions with their arms spread to grapple and their mouths spewing warnings and prophecies nonstop, did not.

Chapter 15

For Sooths and Minds Still Free

A soothsayer rushed at Jantharl. "Know you that the kender will seek to leap into the vortex that the statue and book disappear into! Then the fabric of reality will right itself, and we'll all learn what was going on before!"

"I never trust anyone who talks about the fabric of reality," Jantharl snarled at the man, as he ducked another soothsayer's clutching hands. "Someone 'ported these mad-heads here to delay us!" he called to his companions.

"Proclaim the obvious, bard!" the urhult snapped, leaping with both feet onto a soothsayer's toes. The man's oration promptly turned into a howl of hopping pain.

Which did nothing at all to stifle the next soothsayer, right behind the hopping one.

"Trapped in a loop of time we are, here in Fort Thesk!" he told everyone within earshot. "The kender's presence will end that loop!"

Another grabbed Oparlra from behind, wrapping his arms around her and slowing her sprint to a stagger.

"All seekers of truth know the assassin's poison brings on visions, false visions that mislead the unwary!" he declaimed into her ear. "Know you, all of you, that the dragon's bubbles drive away these falsehoods, and let the enlightened see clearly!"

"Very helpful. Thank you, saer!" Oparlra snapped, going to the cobbles in a sudden roll that succeeded in breaking the soothsayer's firm grasp.

Another soothsayer promptly rushed in to grapple with her. "The troll who thought itself invisible once picked up the book you seek," he told her brightly, "and the book sought to communicate with him by using a pop-up—but he thought it alive and dangerous, and so put it down and moved on."

Oparlra sighed, lifted one leg in a brutally hard kick, then twisted free as the soothsayer shrieked and let go of her to clutch at his injured anatomy.

"If the Sunites are allowed to enact the ritual they intend around the statue, it will learn how to work stone-shaping magic and how doing so can endanger us all!" another soothsayer warned, trying to grab Tammaszar.

The minotaur turned and slashed at the man with one horn to keep him at bay, then whirled around and ran on. "Don't let them slow us down!" he belted. "Keep running!"

"The goliath will fall in love with the statue and defend it as they dance together!" another soothsayer called. "It's very important that you hear and heed this!"

"I'm sure," Jantharl panted, "but important to whom? Other madmen?"

Melgor crashed to the cobbles an instant later, dragged down by a soothsayer who'd literally climbed up his back while chanting, "If the cowardly minotaur ever reads the book entirely through, he will learn he must destroy the castle. Else he and everyone he loves and all who dwell within the castle will perish in a great battle!"

Another soothsayer rushed up to bawl into the minstrel's face. "A hero sought to destroy the statue nine winters ago, but those who wanted Thaelfortress doomed sent a roc, flying hard, to stop him. He died, crushed against the base of the statue—caught between a roc and a hard place."

Melgor winced. "Aaargh! Do all of you seek to be bad minstrels? Because—"

A third soothsayer joined in, clutching at the minstrel's throat to silence him. "Beware the red umber hulk," he intoned, his voice heavy with impressively portentous doom. "It wrote the book ascribed to the dragonborn and the sovereign blue tome. It encountered the gnome sappers in their tunnels, and they doused it in red paint, leaving it well red. It will become part of their bomb."

"Their bomb?" Tammaszar asked in disbelief, delivering a hard kick that sent two of the soothsayers crouched over Melgor flying. Then he hauled the third to his feet, dragging the winded minstrel upright with him. "Have you any more foolishness to spout?"

The soothsayer gaped at him. "Why, minotaur, you've heard almost none of what all folk must know, to save the Realms from doom! There's the matter of the statue's garter belt, and that of the knight-commander here in Thaelfortress, who tore out his own hair in frus—"

"My question," Tammaszar informed the soothsayer gravely, as he flung the still gabbling man bodily into two or three of his approaching fellows, "was, I fear, rhetorical. My apologies."

Another soothsayer was already hurrying up from another direction, proclaiming to the street at large, "... yet the deaf adventurer was heard to say, as he departed the festhall, 'Well, that was disappointing; they only had a dragon hoard in there. I fancied ... companionship.' And from that moment forth, the—oop!"

"Sorry," Jantharl said to the sprawling, winded man he'd just kneed in the gut and then shoved sprawling over his knee to tumble headfirst onto the cobbles. "But not very."

"Hence the decapitation," the man continued obliviously to the stones his nose had just met. "Yet there will come a day when ..."

"We run out of soothsayers at last." Melgor finished the soothsayer's sentence heartily, and the five companions rushed on.

They raced out into the littered—but for the moment thankfully not under bombardment—mustering yard, where the donkey cart limped along ahead of them, one of its wheels broken and wobbling. The poor donkey shivered and shuddered under the fierce mental goading of the surviving pair of illithids riding in its cart.

With one accord the five companions ducked low, refrained from shouting, and ran across the yard, passing on the other side of the statue from the limping cart.

And so, they reached Violatarr's Magnificent Mansion of Taste Violations at the same time as the two mind flayers.

Who turned to hiss, writhe their tentacles, and hurl fear, pain, and the illusion of a sprouting forest of hungrily reaching tentacles at the five companions.

Which was their first mistake. At the first sign of Tammaszar readying a spell, they raised their clawed hands to awaken their enchanted rings and hurl forth magic. Sizzling ruby beams of magic shot out of the rings—beams that dissolved everything in their path, but thankfully fell short of the minotaur—followed by cones of emerald magic that Jantharl didn't like the look of at all, and ...

The mind flayers entirely forgot to continue coercing their donkey.

The donkey promptly tried to flee from them. It leaped through the festhall's front display window—filigreed screens and oh-so-tasteful scantily garbed mannequins and all—in a terrific bell-like shattering of ruby-hued bubble glass.

Floonq winced. "Now there's a major ass in the panel!"

The illithids rocked as their cart almost overturned, then were forced to stop loosing deadly magic to clutch the cart's sides, just trying to stay aboard. The terrified donkey kicked and bucked and kept on racing forward, taking the cart through the window and into the festhall.

"Oh, no," the urhult commented. "Not wise. Don't put the cart before the whor—"

There were flashes and screams and toppling statuettes and tapestries inside the festhall. The illithids had let loose with their rings again.

The five hurrying companions saw one of the house ladies appear in the shattered window. The mind flayers struggled with something right behind her.

She stood shivering and barking and staring wide-eyed, every strand of her long hair thrust straight out from her skull like the spines of a stingback sea urchin. Then a well-thrown brick from Oparlra crashed into a mind flayer face, right between its eyes, and its mental assault on the lady was broken.

Drooling and whimpering, the festhall professional fled out of the ravaged window and down the street.

"Sane folk would flee like all the Hells right now," Melgor commented, as the five rushed the last few strides to the gaping window.

Jantharl chuckled as he bent and scooped up more broken bricks to hurl. "I guess none of us are sane folk, or want to be."

Deep in the front parlor of Violatarr's Magnificent Mansion of Taste Violations, the cart was on its side. Its lone visible wheel—the broken one and the uppermost part of the shattered conveyance—still spun crazily. The illithids were struggling to get free of it, their robes caught.

Jantharl led the charge.

When a purple hand swept up, the ring on it flaring, he threw one of his bricks hard and accurately, smashing illithid fingers and the deadly ruby beam aside with them. Then, once he was close enough to slash with his dagger, he flung his other brick side-long at the second mind flayer.

Suddenly his mind sagged under the crushing weight of yellow thunder, red and black menace, and looming illithid eyes.

Eyes inside his head, staring white and relentless, larger ... and larger ...

He sliced and hacked blindly but furiously, his blade ripping something solid but wet and increasingly yielding. There was a horrid smell, a gush of hot gore, agonized squalling that rose into a wail, and—

Wood smoke, strong and sudden. Followed by, abruptly, nothing under his feet.

Jantharl fell into darkness, not even having time enough to scream.

Chapter 16 A Fat Minstrel No More

Jantharl fell, slamming his elbow numbingly against a post and the back of his head against something he never saw. Then he landed on something solid, with a meaty smack.

A body. A body that grunted in pain as it collapsed under his sudden arrival. As it slammed to the floor, he rolled off it to his feet, to blink and peer into the gloom, his dagger still ready.

One of the illithids had used its magic to burn through the floor. It meant more to free itself than to try to harm him, and ended up dumping him into the uppermost cellar of the festhall, into one of the private rooms.

A chamber, he was interested to learn, that held a group of masked men who'd been . . . licking custard off a glowing golden corset worn by another of the house ladies. He'd just slammed one of those men to the floor and the rest stared at him dazedly. The house lady sat up on her table, gaping at him in similar astonishment.

"Well met," Jantharl managed. Adding a cheerful grin, he spun around, found a door, and fled through it.

Angry cries arose behind him, so he dodged around a corner where the dark passage forked. Yanking open the first door he found, he slipped through it and closed it as quickly as he quietly could.

Overhead, the fresh crashes of spell blasts and tumbling bodies befell and raged. Amid the din, someone rushed past his door.

Jantharl kept very still.

He was alone in a much smaller room, a spy chamber that had holes in one wall that looked out into a larger, well-lit room.

A voice hissed close by, seeming to come from that second, larger room. "Halt and converse in peace, or die. That paint we doused you with will explode if we trigger it, killing you and setting off our other bombs—and so destroying most of Fort Thesk."

"Will kill you, too," rumbled a deep, liquid voice that didn't sound anywhere near human. Jantharl risked approaching a spy hole to look in its direction.

The liquid voice came from an umber hulk that dripped with wet crimson paint. Seven gnomes stood in a ring around it, their bodies glistening with grease. The gnomes held all sorts of strange-looking little things of metal and glass that winked and pulsed and had buttons and pull-rods and hoses.

Wonderful. In that instant, the pitched battle overhead seemed a much safer place to be.

"No," the hissing voice—which belonged to one of the oldest-looking gnomes—said. "We protect ourselves against the blasts we cause. It is a mistake to assume we are as foolish as humans."

"So, you want?"

Jantharl winced. The umber hulk could put more scorn into three words than a scandalized duchess.

"Your strength. Muscle the dragonborn statue down from its plinth and carry it to the castle gates yonder. There, thrust it like a battering ram to batter and break the hinges of the castle gates from the inside."

"More foolish than humans. If statue chipped, even slightly, it come to life. Will defend Thaelfortress, killing you and all the besiegers. Smash you to slime and powdered bone. Undead, Red Wizards, dragons, everyone. Even well-greased little gnomes."

"Even if we make sure its first smash against the gates shatters the hinges and the statue—entirely—into little shards?"

"All little shards will whirl in air like blades and spears. Tireless. Same slaughter." The umber hulk sounded amused.

"And just how would you know all this?" one of the gnomes said, sneering.

"Has happened before with others made statues by same wizard."

"Wait," one of the gnomes told its fellows. It advanced on the umber hulk. "So if this statue is something or someone turned to stone, who is it?"

"See bad, you? Dragonborn monk. Doomed to be statue until atonement done."

"And when will that be?"

"When book she wrote, book that writes self from back to front, writings ever-changing, magic book with wisp of divine power for foretelling, is destroyed. Something only she can do."

"Do how?"

"Will summon book and devour it, if awakened properly."

"Which is?" another gnome prompted impatiently.

"Corset of custard summoning and matching garter belt must be put on statue. Ring, that makes maids into men and men into maids and back, must be knotted on one of garter tails. Human must then remove garter belt, with teeth not hands."

"What mad-wits utter fool came up with that method of destroying the book?"

"Wise old wizard. Typical of humor."

There it was again, that corset of custard summoning . . .

Jantharl firmly quelled a sigh and turned gingerly, trying to keep utterly silent.

Jantharl turned gingerly, trying to keep utterly silent. Something shifted down his front, near his belt, and he remembered the purse. He turned back to the light coming through the spy holes and retrieved the purse with slow, quiet care. Then, he dared to open it.

The gnomes pressed the umber hulk for all it could tell them of "special" defenders of the castle, but Jantharl paid little attention. He was too busy peering.

They were gems, all right. Rubies and sapphires and emeralds, some of them bigger than his thumb. He slipped a few into one of his other pouches, then closed the purse again and hurried back to the room into which he'd fallen.

The masked men were—thankfully—gone. The house lady was mopping up custard, looking less than pleased. Jantharl stepped into the room and quietly closed the door.

The lady looked up. "You," she said, and her voice was not friendly.

"Ah, lady, I am sorry for my unpleasant—but unintentional, I assure you!—arrival. I, ah, wish to do business with you."

Chapter 17
The End of Many Things

"Oh?" the house lady responded in quite a different voice. She struck a pose. Jantharl couldn't help but notice . . . many things. But one of them was that she wore a golden garter belt that matched her glowing, already-sprouting-fresh-custard corset.

"The garments you now wear—may I buy them from you?"

The displeased look returned. "Certainly not! This is the easiest gig I've ever had!"

Jantharl sighed. Yes, it would be, wouldn't it?

"It pains me to do this," he announced, "but . . ."

He drew his dagger and strode toward her in the same smooth, swift, aye-I-do-mean-business-and-am-good-at-it movement.

The house lady eyed Jantharl's blade, then his face, and concluded defeat was better than death or slashed flesh and a lost career.

"Very well," she said sullenly, "but take yourself back the other side of that door while I change. Our agreement covers the garments only."

Jantharl bowed. "Agreement," he echoed. He stepped back through the door.

He counted to four, slowly, then opened it again.

He was in time to see the house lady rush through the secret panel she'd just slid open, to flee—straight into Melgor's waiting fist.

"My apologies," the minstrel told her politely as she toppled, out cold. Then he caught her nearest arm to keep her from crashing to the flagstones. With a grunt of effort, he hefted her onto the table.

"This'll go faster," he told Jantharl, "with two of us. You roll and hold her as I undo things."

"The voice of experience?"

"Umm-hmm."

They left her face up on the table, covered with a warming robe they found hanging on a stand behind the door. By then, she was snoring slightly. Jantharl left the purse of gems on her tummy by way of payment.

"We still have to find a certain ring," he told the minstrel, as they headed through the panel into the passage down which the house lady had intended to flee. "One that turns maids into men, and—"

Melgor flung up a hand for silence and then pointed to one of the fingers on it.

A finger adorned with a ring.

As he and Jantharl stared at each other, the minstrel slowly and meaningfully slid the ring off.

And was suddenly a fat minstrel no more.

Jantharl found himself gaping at a buxom woman.

He was speechless. Flabbergasted.

And was still gaping when the woman reached out, grabbed his hand, and said briskly, "Come on! We've got a book to destroy before those illithids get a chance to use it! Oh, and I'm Melgor."

"Melgora? As in the pirate?"

"The same. Not all dangerous women are lithe, thin waifs with big dark eyes and little pouts." She towed him on down the passage into deeper darkness, fumbling a tiny glowstone out of a bodice pouch so they could see. "Don't let go of that garter belt, now!"

Jantharl clutched it more tightly, aware that the corset clutched against it was dripping custard. "Uh, the illithids will use the book to do what, exactly?"

"To summon thirty devils, of course! Don't you bards know your lore?"

"Not that sort of lore!"

"Ah, the juicy bits you're missing!"

They hurried up a steep stair, into a small closet-like chamber with doors on all sides. Melgora led Jantharl through one of them and out of the festhall. They emerged into the brighter light of—the muster yard. Which was being bombarded again.

"There they are!" The shout was feminine and furious. "Die, fools!"

The flash was blinding, and Jantharl was dimly aware of tongues of lightning snarling and spitting greedily all around him.

"That should have slain us," he gasped aloud, a little dazedly. Melgora still had firm hold of his hand and was dragging him along. Hard.

"Come on, bard!"

Facing them, barring their way to the statue and ignoring the coach-sized boulders that hurtled down out of the sky to crash here and there in the courtyard, was Hurmeldra Straelstone. The chaos sorcerer's hand was bandaged, and her eyes were two flames of mad hatred.

"Still standing? Have more lightning! Die, hrast you!"

"Yes, die, servants of dark gods!"

That voice was louder, male, familiar, and much closer.

Jantharl ducked sideways as he ran, out of sheer habit.

The furious paladin of Sune was cleaving the air so wildly that his sword would probably have missed Jantharl anyway.

Melgora sighed. "No spell wall can hold back holy folk forever." She let go of Jantharl's hand long enough to snatch something from her belt and empty it. Then she grabbed him again and ran on.

From right behind them came the sound of an armored paladin slipping helplessly on scores of glass marbles. Followed by the sounds of the same armored paladin bouncing helplessly and profanely on the flagstones.

Then Straelstone's second spell struck them.

Jantharl felt pain and a little numbness. Whatever Melgora wore or carried that drank in the lightning had run out, or run down, or—

"Not so fast!" a voice hissed from near their feet. The gnomes!

Sure enough, no less than three flagstones ahead of them had lifted. Each of them sported a greased gnome underneath. The nearest one heaved what looked like a large metal cauldron with its lid crudely welded shut out into the courtyard. It bore the legend, "Dubious Construction Coster, Duly Bonded and Warranted."

"Your bomb." Jantharl sighed. "I knew we'd—"

With a kerrrrAASSHHH that shook Jantharl's back teeth, a boulder the size of a small cottage obliterated Straelstone, the bomb, and two of the gnomes and their flagstones. Just one gnome was left to stare at Jantharl—and gulp audibly and descend out of sight.

Leaving their way to the statue clear.

Jantharl looked back over his shoulder. As he'd expected, a bruised and angry Mandurjack was back on his feet and past the marbles. The paladin limped, slashing the air with his large and sharp sword as he came.

The flagstones shook under them—but it wasn't because of two boulders that arrived at that moment to bounce noisily across the mustering yard, clearing away a few of the deceased broadsheet scribes and their cages. The source of the vibrations was too close to Melgora and Jantharl for that.

In fact, it was close enough for them to clearly see something shining in the gaps between the heaving flagstones.

"Oh, dung," the bard and minstrel said together, in unintended, disgusted unison.

Tathtauraunt rose into view with majestic slowness, a quartet of baleful eye tyrants all joined together by a massive central body as big as some of the boulders the Thayans were so enthusiastically throwing. As if on cue, one such giant boulder smote a distant building and sent its upper floors toppling.

"Feel no worry!" a familiar voice called from behind them. "Leave Tathtauraunt to us!"

It was Oparlra, Tammaszar and Floonq—munching on a piece of mind flayer tentacle with an air of contentment—were with her. Almost casually, the minotaur unleashed a spell that dropped the paladin flat on his face and into immobile silence.

Far across the courtyard beyond the statue, another boulder landed and shattered with a noise not unlike the sound of a falling keep slamming into the buildings below it.

Jantharl recalled the last time he'd heard that particular noise. He winced at the memory and snarled, "Not now!" aloud to himself. Then he and Melgora were at the statue at last.

They swarmed up Lanthroanra with a fine disregard for her race and gender and began the struggle to get the corset of custard summoning on her.

"Garter belt first," Melgora gasped after their first few attempts. Their eyes smarted and their ears rang from the flashes and shrieking explosions the beholder cast—as well as the warding spells and force-walls with which Oparlra and Tammaszar defended.

"As the song goes," Melgora snarled fiercely, as she wrestled with garter tails, "feel no worry, my right and rightfully trembling—yes!"

Jantharl rather dazedly watched Melgora finish knotting the ring into the garter tails. They'd done it.

He let out a huge sigh, took hold of Lanthroanra's stony leg, fixed his teeth around the garter belt, and let himself slide down.

As it came off, Fort Thesk seemed to go very quiet around them. In that hush, stone turned to flesh in front of Jantharl's eyes.

The dragonborn monk drew back her foot and kicked Jantharl's head—very hard.

Whereupon the world went away again.

Dark.

Deep.

Darker.

Deeper.

Jantharl was somewhere dark and deep and confused. As he drifted on downward, the void around him was enlivened by occasional faint booms and crashes and gabbling voices.

Deeper still.

Somewhere nearby, he was dimly aware, he could hear drunken singing. Human males, none of them prospective bards. Or even minstrels. He hoped.

The singing swam louder and nearer, until he recognized it.

The warriors of Impiltur were whooping it up.

In the street below. Outside the windows of the best club in Thaelfortress.

He recognized its magnificent vaulted wooden ceiling. Off to his left was the clink of cutlery and crystal tallglasses ringing as they were gently struck together in toasts. And people—not many—laughed and chattered. Friends. His friends.

He turned his head and beheld a glittering table of candlelit decanters and domed platters. Floonq, Tammaszar, Melgora, and Oparlra were all enjoying what looked like a marvelous—and very expensive—feast.

They espied him and were on their feet in a happy roar of greeting. Oparlra and Melgora rushed over to him.

He lay on a cot, he realized at about the same time they stopped crying his name and "You're awake!" and started smothering him with kisses.

"Bards!" Floonq said disgustedly, from the far side of a nigh-empty tallglass almost as big as it was. "What is it about bards? Lovelies don't rush over to smother me with kisses, no matter what I do!"

"It's his surprising journey," Tamm replied, downing half a decanter of firewine in one long gulp. "The ladies can never resist a surprising journey."

"Remind me to become a bard," the urhult replied.

"Become a bard," Jantharl told him solemnly, the moment his lips were free to speak and breathe. "And save the Realms. Again."

About the Author

Ed Greenwood created the FORGOTTEN REALMS® setting, and he's still the prime mover in making it go. His neighbors sometimes hear him walking in the woods, shouting, "Go, Realms, go!"

Editor
Susan Morris

Managing Editor
Kim Mohan

Development and Editing Lead
Jeremy Crawford

Senior Producer
Christopher Perkins

Producers
Greg Bilsland, Stan!

Senior Creative Director
Jon Schindehette

Art Director
Kate Irwin

Illustrator
Eva Widemann

Publishing Production Manager
Angie Lokotz

© 2012 Wizards of the Coast LLC